and it was on the promise that they would get tramway terms, made on behalf of the Government by the Secretary to the Board of Education, that the Second Reading of the Bill was carried. Now they came down after three months of labour, and here was this miserable mouse of instruction which the right hon. Gentleman proposed. The right hon. Gentleman might say that the instruction would be sent to the Committee upstairs, and that if the Committee did not do what was right with regard to terms, there would be another opportunity of considering the question. That was not exactly the position in which they should be placed. There was a clause before the House. They knew what the Committee thought of it. But it was proposed to give free rein for fifty-three years to these private monopolies, the longest term of payment ever proposed to be given in any Bill. That was in the Bill, and when they came to the instruction dealing with it, it should not have been left to the Secretary to the Board of Education to give a pious opinion on the matter. There should have been in the instruction some recognition of the fact that the terms in the Bill were highly unsatisfactory; and that if they were not improved in Committee, the House would have to deal with the matter when the Bill came back for a Third Reading. He hoped that the Prime Minister, whom he was glad to see was present, would give them another opportunity of considering this question at 8.15 p.m., and he promised the right hon. Gentleman that he would put down a fresh and definite instruction, and that if he obtained an opportunity of doing so, there would be such a volume of opinion behind it, as to what the terms of purchase ought to be, that he believed the Government would hesitate to decline to accept it. He proposed tramway terms. What could be the objection to that? It might be said that twenty-one years was too short a period; but let seven or fourteen years more be added if need be. The great principle to establish was that, as under tramways purchase, there was no good-will. He wanted no good-will, and if they knocked out the good-will, the Government would effect a great deal in connection with the Bill. Twenty or thirty years would be ridiculous. Some of his hon. friends suggested twenty-one years good-will, but he did not want to have any Bill with good-will in it. He was in favour of the principle which he learned in better days from the Secretary to the Board of Education, the Member for North St. Pancras, and the junior Member for Devonport. Why had these Gentlemen all changed their minds? It was because they had sustained a defeat at the polls in London. They had not got the Parliamentary temperament yet. They must learn to keep their tempers and stick to their principles, and that would enable them to carry their principles sometimes to a victorious conclusion. He had not changed his belief in regard to this Bill. The right hon. Gentleman had spoken of wicked people who were behind this opposition; he himself was behind it, and he could quote his speech. All he could say was that his instruction at the present moment did not in the least meet their opposition, and as to the terms of purchase, it contained nothing whatever. It did not improve the purchase clause in the Bill one iota, and did not fulfil the terms laid down by the Secretary to the Board of Education. He had been told that he could not take the opinion of the House upon this question, unless the Prime Minister could give them a little more time. If he did, he would promise him that they would have this matter dealt with as a positive instruction, and he would take a vote of the House upon it.

MR. CHURCHILL said he generally agreed with a great deal that had fallen from his right hon. friend. He thought the right hon. Gentleman had shown very clearly that, whatever opinion this House might have formed upon the merits of the Bill, it was not the question before the House. That question was a much more narrow and restricted one, and his right hon. friend, in the course of his eloquent remarks on the general practice, did not use any argument at all against the instruction which he had put upon the Paper, and upon which the House would be asked to vote. The right hon. Gentleman directed his arguments to the general question of the London and District Bill, a very wide and vastly complicated question—how vast and complicated the House might gather from the size of the book containing the evidence taken before the Committee in another place. He had never desired to commit the House or the Committee, His Majesty's Government or the Board of Trade, to the support of this Bill as it stood upon its merits, and he agreed that there was a very solid foundation for a good many of the arguments which had been used that evening. But there was one thing he had desired on behalf of the Government, and that was to press and urge upon the House the proper, scientific, and regular consideration of this important and complicated question by the only method by which justice could be done to such a proposal—namely, by careful and impartial examination at the hands of a Select Committee of the House. No Member of the House, if he had stood in his place, could have taken any other course than that which he had felt it right to take. No one denied that it would be of immense practical benefit to millions of people if cheap and abundant electricity could be supplied on terms more in accordance with those possessed by other great cities. Year after year measures of this kind had been put forward to achieve this end. The ingenuity of every one was exhausted in trying to steer this large public object through all the cross-currents which obstructed and delayed it. Everyone knew what the object was; everyone knew as the years went by that the object had not been achieved and that there was no immediate prospect of that object being obtained, except by means of the proposals they had before them; and when a proposal had been examined for thirty or forty sittings of a Committee of some of the ablest men in the country, and embodied in a Bill of eighty or 100 clauses of great complexity; when it was supported by a large proportion of the Liberal Members for London; when it was brought before the House in these circumstances, and in a year when unemployment had reached its maximum, and when private business had reached its minimum, he said that, whatever opinion might be entertained about this or that particular clause, it would be improper and disrespectful and almost indecent procedure on the part of Parliament to fling such a Bill out without paying it the respect of a proper and scientific examination before a Committee. He ventured to say that that advice would be given by anyone who was called upon to represent an important Government Department, and the fact that hon. Gentlemen opposite chose the Second Reading, in defiance of all the principles he had always heard enunciated by their leaders, to cast their votes against the Government, showed how completely faction, and faction alone had led to their action. He did not hold that His Majesty's Government were committed to the merits of these Bills.

MR. H. C. LEA (St. Pancras, E.): Then why put the Government Whips on?

MR. CHURCHILL said he would try to explain if the House would permit. What he did consider the Government responsible for was the securing of proper consideration at the hands of a Committee. The Committee was now examining the Bill. The Board of Trade would have access to that Committee and would watch the progress of the Bill through the Committee. He very largely agreed with his right hon. friend that it was a very doubtful question whether the local authorities affected by the Bill ought not to have a right of veto on any compulsory powers of entering into their area. That was a question which must be very carefully examined before the Committee, and one of the matters which the Board of Trade would carefully watch. Then there was the question of the purchase terms, a most complicated question. There never had been a purchase clause in a bulk supply Bill before; but he was prepared to say that the purchase terms in their present form were not satisfactory, and it would be the duty of the Board of Trade to represent that before the Committee when they were called upon to give evidence. He agreed that Clause 77, on which his right hon. friend based the gravamen of his attack, was objectionable. Every single clause of the kind had been objected to by the Board of Trade, and he was prepared to give the House a pledge that, if that clause appeared in the Bill when it came back to the House, he would not only not support it, but would counsel the House to reject the Bill. But these were questions for Committee. He asked the House not to ride off on the question of the merits of the Bill, for what they were really dealing with was the proper procedure to be applied to this complex and difficult question. All these matters would be examined before the Committee, and the House and the Government would remain perfectly free to take their own course when the Bill came back. For his part he intended to reserve his opinion, as His Majesty's Government reserved theirs, on the final action to be taken, until they had the Report of a thoroughly competent Committee as to how far these clauses were reconcilable with the public interest. He feared that what he had been saying was irrelevant, because the question before the House was not the merits of the Bill, but whether the House should take this opportunity of affirming the large general principle that, across all the confusion and all the cross-currents of electrical enterprise in London, there should be one general line of advance marked out—that was, the establishment of one united system of electric supply in the London area under the control of the government of London.

MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.) said he did not like the Government's system of municipalisation, which was first to set up a monopoly and then to give the community power to buy it up. The right hon. Gentleman said that it was very desirable to give to London a cheap supply of electricity, but that was not the way to do so, nor could that object be obtained by any form of purchasing clause, because they could not accomplish two incompatible objects. It was impossible to have a clause which would provide fair terms of purchase thirty or forty years hence and at the same time provide for the proper development and growth of the undertaking in the interval. If this House enacted a fair purchasing clause, it must inevitably have a prejudicial effect upon the supply in the interval. They could not have it both ways. This was really an attempt to square the circle. At Question time they had the object-lesson of what had happened in the case of the National Telephone Company. There the purchasing clause had had the effect that the undertaking had been starved. The company had not developed its business, but on the contrary was refusing to take orders and to spend money and was dismissing its employees. That was the inevitable effect of the purchase clause. He was not prepared to discuss the purchase clause of this Bill, though he agreed that the terms of it would be very onerous to the London County Council. The right hon. Gentleman and some colleagues of his in the representation of London had now completely changed their attitude. They were formerly all in favour of municipal control, and voted against a Bill which was in substance the same as this. He supposed they would presently vote in favour of the Bill and say the position was changed, which he denied.

Mr. CHURCHILL rose in his place, and claimed to move, "That the Question be now put."

Question put, "That the Question be now put."

TELLERS FOR THE NOES—Sir
 William Bull and Mr. Cave.

Ordered, That it be an Instruction to the Committee to insert in the Bill a provision conferring purchasing powers on the London County Council. That any person affected by such a provision shall be entitled to be heard before the Committee upon any Petition presented not later than 22nd October.

Whereupon Mr. SPEAKER, pursuant to the Order of the House of 31st July, adjourned the House without Question put.

Adjourned at twenty minutes after Eleven o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

EARL OF ROSSE.

Petition of William Edward Parsons, Earl of Rosse in the Peerage of Ireland, claiming a right to vote at the elections of Representative Peers for Ireland; read, and referred to the Lord Chancellor to consider and report thereupon to the House.

The Lord Ettrick (L. Napier) took the Oath.

PRIVATE BILL BUSINESS.

The LORD CHANCELLOR acquainted the House, That the Clerk of the Parliaments had laid upon the Table the Certificate from the Examiners that the Standing Orders applicable to the following Bill have been complied with: Local Government Provisional Order (No. 3).

The same was ordered to lie on the Table.

RETURNS; REPORTS, ETC.

TRADE REPORTS: ANNUAL SERIES.

NORTH SEA FISHERIES.

Third Report (Northern Area) on Fishery and Hydrographical Investigations in the North Sea and adjacent waters 1904-1906; Statistical Papers (in continuation of Second Report, Part I. Hydrography [Cd. 3358.]).

Presented (by command), and ordered to lie on the Table.

DISEASES OF ANIMALS ACTS, 1894 TO 1903.

Order 7572, dated 8th October, 1908, revoking Order No. 6985, dated 11th October, 1905, and defining a specified part of the port of Manchester as a foreign animals wharf.

DESTRUCTIVE INSECTS AND PESTS ACTS, 1877 TO 1907.

Order, dated 5th October, 1908, entitled "The American Gooseberry Mildew (Shropshire) Order of 1908."

SUPERANNUATION (TREASURY MINUTES).

Granting retired allowances under Section 2 of the Superannuation Act to: Mr. H. S. Bell, telegraph engineer, second class, Post Office, dated 16th September, 1908; Mr. W. D. Ballantyne, sorting clerk and telegraphist, Edinburgh Post Office, dated 2nd October, 1908.

Lord President would be willing to agree to the slight increase of one which he proposed, in order to provide, in a manner which he thought would be more convenient than the other method suggested, for the representation of Ireland.

Amendment moved—

“In page 1, line 19, to leave out the word ‘fifteen,’ and to insert the word ‘sixteen.’”—
(Lord Ampthill.)

LORD ASHBOURNE referred to his Amendment on the Paper also dealing with the number of persons of which the Council should consist. He agreed that it was not desirable to add to the number unduly, and that no increase should be made which could reasonably be avoided. He was prepared to acquiesce in the Government view to make way for an Irish nurse by reducing the number of English nurses from four to three rather than the proposal to increase the number of nurses from six to seven. The suggestion of the Lord President would work out the same without increasing the number of the Council. In a subsequent Amendment he asked that “eighteen” should be substituted for “fifteen,” but he admitted that that number would be one too many, and that he only required seventeen to carry out his object. If the Bill stood as Lord Ampthill and the Government suggested, the whole burden of representation in the case of Scotland and Ireland would be placed upon one nurse from each country. No one had a higher respect for Scottish and Irish female intelligence than he had, but it was hardly reasonable to say that that representation was adequate. The clause provided that one registered medical practitioner should be appointed by the Local Government Board for England. He proposed, in a subsequent Amendment, to provide also for one to be appointed by the Local Government Board for Ireland and one by the Local Government Board for Scotland. He was not concerned as to whether it might be desired to throw over some other members of the Council to make way for these two; but it was not reasonable in so large and important a Council to place the whole burden of maintaining the Irish or Scottish case upon one nurse. He hoped the Lord President would consider the matter.

*VISCOUNT WOLVERHAMPTON said the question was, after all, what was the desirable number. The Committee who considered the Bill unanimously recommended that the number should not exceed fifteen, and they coupled with that a strong opinion that it should not be more than eleven. The Government were anxious that there should be full and proper representation on the Council, not only of England but also of Scotland and of Ireland; but he thought that in extending the number to sixteen they would be really going as far as they ought to go in the matter.

LORD ASHBOURNE wished to know who the sixteenth person was to be. Room was made for an Irish nurse by putting one of the English nurses aside and altering the number from four to three. That being so, where did the sixteenth person come in? He desired to make the number seventeen, so as to provide for one registered medical practitioner being appointed by the Local Government Board for Ireland and one by the Local Government Board for Scotland.

*VISCOUNT WOLVERHAMPTON said there were to be seven registered nurses elected as the direct representatives of registered nurses. Four were to be elected by the nurses registered in the general register whose registered address was in England or Wales, one by the nurses registered in the general register whose registered address was in Scotland, one by the nurses registered in the general register whose registered address was in Ireland, and one, who should be a past or present matron of a public hospital for the insane, by the nurses registered in the Mental Nurses Register. That absorbed the entire number.

LORD AMPHILL held that there was a grave objection to the proposal of Lord Ashbourne. To increase the number of the representatives appointed by the Local Government Board would upset the balance between doctors and nurses on the Council—a matter likely to lead to a great deal of difficulty and jealousy.

Under the present proposal it was as evenly balanced as possible. The noble and learned Lord had said that the whole burden of representation would be on one nurse. He thought that hardly a fair statement of the case. They might take it that anybody appointed to a council of this kind would not be a partisan, but would endeavour to be representative of the interests of the whole kingdom. Secondly, there were the three persons appointed by the Privy Council, who might be taken to be impartial and generally representative. Those were his reasons for preferring to adhere to his own proposal that the Council should be increased by one only.

THE LORD PRIVY SEAL AND SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (The Earl of CREWE): My Lords, I think the Committee will agree that, as a general principle, it is desirable that this Council should not be increased in numbers to a greater extent than can be helped. These bodies work more easily and more efficiently when not too large. The noble and learned Lord opposite asked how it was, if we were prepared to agree to the increase from fifteen to sixteen, that we also proposed to substitute three for four in subsection (f). The answer is that if sixteen is agreed to my noble friend would not propose to move the other Amendment, but would maintain the figure at four as it stands at present.

On Question, Amendment agreed to.

LORD STANMORE called attention to the provision in the clause that three members of the Council should be "appointed by the Privy Council." He asked whether the Lord President could inform him what was the meaning in this connection, of the words "appointed by the Privy Council." Did they mean appointed by the King in Council, or by the Lord President of the Council, or by the vote of the members of the Council?

*VISCOUNT WOLVERHAMPTON said the appointments would be made in the same way as all other appointments made by the Privy Council—namely, by the Lord President.

LORD STANMORE thought it would be better that it should be so defined in the Bill.

VISCOUNT WOLVERHAMPTON moved to amend Paragraph (d)—

"Three registered medical practitioners to be appointed by the British Medical Association, one to be a physician, one a surgeon, and one a general practitioner."

by leaving out all the words after "Association."

Amendment moved—

"In page 2, line 5, to leave out from the word 'Association' to the end of Paragraph (d)."— (Viscount Wolverhampton.)

LORD AMPHILL accepted the Amendment, which would, he said, give greater latitude and discretion to the British Medical Association.

On Question, Amendment agreed to.

LORD ASHBOURNE moved to insert in place of the words which had just been omitted, the words "one to be resident in England, one to be resident in Ireland, and one to be resident in Scotland." He understood that these words would be accepted.

Amendment moved—

"In page 2, line 5, to insert the words 'one to be resident in England, one to be resident in Ireland, and one to be resident in Scotland.'"
(Lord Ashbourne.)

LORD AMPHILL suggested that, instead of "resident in," words should be substituted providing that one should be representative of England, one of Ireland, and one of Scotland. There were obvious inconveniences attached to the words "resident in." The Council would probably meet in London, and it might be difficult for a doctor living in Ireland or in Scotland to attend; but there might be in London a doctor who would be regarded as representative of either Scotland or Ireland whom it would be convenient to place upon the Council. The words he suggested—namely, "representative of"—would, of course, not exclude the possibility of appointing a doctor who was resident in Scotland or in Ireland. The words were wider, and gave larger discretion, and he hoped, therefore, that his suggestion would commend itself to Lord Ashbourne.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY said the words "representative of" would imply "chosen by," and would give rise to many opportunities of dispute.

*VISCOUNT WOLVERHAMPTON said his difficulty in reference to Lord Ampthill's suggestion was: Who was to be the electing body? They would have to create some sort of organisation in Scotland and Ireland in order to elect the representative. He thought it would be better to leave it as was proposed by Lord Ashbourne.

On Question, Amendment agreed to.

LORD AMPHILL moved to increase from six to seven the number of registered nurses to be elected as the direct representatives of the registered nurses. This was, he explained, consequential upon the Amendment which their Lordships had already accepted in regard to the number of the Council.

Amendment moved—

"In page 2, line 10, to leave out the word 'six,' and to insert the word 'seven.'"—
(Lord Ampthill.)

On Question, Amendment agreed to.

*VISCOUNT WOLVERHAMPTON then moved that this additional member of the council should be elected by the nurses registered in Ireland.

Amendment moved—

"In page 2, line 15, after the word 'Scotland,' to insert the words 'one shall be elected by the nurses registered in the general register whose registered address is in Ireland.'"—
(Viscount Wolverhampton.)

On Question, Amendment agreed to.

LORD BALFOUR OF BURLEIGH said that in these Amendments the Committee had dealt with the constitution and appointment of the general council. But the clause also provided for the appointment of a temporary council of six, which was to bring the Act into operation. Of these six, two were to be appointed by the Matrons' Council of Great Britain and Ireland, and one by the Society for the State Registration of Trained Nurses; and he desired to know whether the Lord President of the Council had satisfied himself that these bodies were of sufficient standing to be entrusted with these appointments. If such information as he had been able to obtain was correct, these two bodies were practically the same, or, at any rate, they were ruled by the same people.

*VISCOUNT WOLVERHAMPTON said he had no personal knowledge of the composition of the bodies.

LORD AMPHILL said he could answer the question of his noble friend. The Matrons' Council was founded in 1894, and its primary object was to bring about a uniform system of education, examination, certification, and State registration of nurses in British hospitals. For years it maintained a committee which laboured steadily with that object in view; and its work increased so much that in 1902 it was decided to form a society having for its sole object the State registration of trained nurses. But until the formation of that society the Matrons' Council was the only body working to secure the registration of nurses, and that in itself, he thought, constituted a sufficient claim why it should be represented on the provisional council which was to set up the machinery for the election of the general council. He could guess what had suggested the question of his noble friend. There was a letter about the Bill in The Times that morning, which was as well timed as it was inaccurate. There were two flagrant inaccuracies which sufficiently condemned the rest of the letter. These were that the Matrons' Council was to be permanently represented on the general council; and that the Society for the State Registration of Trained Nurses was to enjoy a similar privilege. Their Lordships had the Bill before them, and they could see that these statements were quite inaccurate. As to the membership of the Matrons' Council, it consisted of close on 200 past and present matrons of hospitals and infirmaries, and that did not include several honorary members, representing foreign countries and the Colonies, who had worked for the State registration of nurses. The membership might have been much larger but for the fact that many matrons were the paid servants of hospital committees, who were strongly opposed to the registration policy of the council.

LORD BALFOUR OF BURLEIGH said that, accurate as was Lord Ampthill's information generally, his guess in this case was entirely erroneous. His question was not prompted by the letter in The Times, because he had not fallen into either of the inaccuracies which the noble Lord had pointed out. He hoped the Lord President of the Council would satisfy himself of the standing of the two bodies by examining their lists of members before he allowed the Bill to pass in its present form.

THE EARL OF CREWE: My noble friend will, no doubt, take the step which the noble Lord suggests. But I might point out that this is really a temporary provision, and that the whole object of these subsections is to get a generally representative council of that very large section of the nursing body who are in favour of the registration of nurses. There are other nurses who are not in favour of registration, and do not wish to have anything to do with it. They, I suppose, do not desire to be and will not be, represented on this body. I confess it appears to me—and I have some knowledge of the composition of these bodies from having held the office which my noble friend now holds—that, generally speaking, that object of obtaining ladies who are representative of nursing will be very well carried out by the provisions contained in the Bill.

Consequential and drafting Amendments agreed to.

Clause 4, as amended, agreed to.

Clauses 5 to 8 agreed to.

Clause 9 :

Consequential Amendment agreed to.

Clause 9, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 10 :

Drafting and consequential Amendments agreed to.

LORD ASHBOURNE moved to add a new subsection providing that the council might appoint three or more members to act as a committee for Ireland and for Scotland, respectively, and might authorise each such committee, subject to revision or approval by the Council, to transact any business of the Council concerning Ireland or Scotland, respectively, which the Council might think it expedient to delegate to such committee. He hoped the Amendment would commend itself to the Lord President for he had been informed that these committees would be a great convenience.

Amendment moved—

“ In page 5, line 11, after the word ‘ Act,’ to insert ‘ The Council may appoint three or more members to act as a committee for Ireland and for Scotland, respectively, and may authorise each such committee, subject to revision or approval by the Council, to transact any business of the Council concerning Ireland or Scotland, respectively, which the Council may think it expedient to delegate to such committee.’ ”—(Lord Ashbourne.)

*VISCOUNT WOLVERHAMPTON opposed the Amendment. He said the proposal was both unnecessary and inexpedient. He thought it undesirable to set up statutory committees who would require separate officials. The clerical work could be perfectly well done in the central office in London, and there was nothing to prevent the Council appointing sub-committees to report on specific points, which would be preferable to a statutory delegation of functions. Uniformity of regulations and procedure was desirable for all parts of the United Kingdom.

LORD ASHBOURNE said that after the Lord President's statement he would not press the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY understood that some little difficulty would arise under the Bill in respect to the

(the Lord President's) subsequent Amendment. He therefore accepted it.

LORD AMPTHILL could not agree to the Amendment, the effect of which would be that any institution could be recommended by the Local Government Board.

THE EARL OF CREWE: We have not reached that point yet. We are on the Amendment of Lord Ashbourne to leave out the words "a Poor Law," and to insert the word "an." I think if the noble Lord would agree to postpone the discussion until we come to the Amendment of my noble friend the Lord President it would be far more convenient, because the two points overlap.

LORD ASHBOURNE said the only question was whether the Lord President would think it desirable to press for the addition of the words "and certify to be wholly or partly maintained out of the rates." He ventured to hope he would not. Surely the Local Government Board might be trusted in the matter.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY hoped that, as a matter of order, the Committee would follow the advice of the noble Earl the Lord Privy Seal, and dispose of the non-contentious Amendment first. The further point as to the introduction of the rates would arise on a subsequent Amendment.

LORD AMPTHILL said that the only object in putting in the words "Poor Law institution" was to indicate that the Local Government Board should confine their recommendations to institutions over which they had a certain amount of control. The effect of Lord Ashbourne's Amendment would be to leave it open to the Local Government Board to recommend institutions with which they had nothing whatever to do.

THE EARL OF CREWE: I may say that we do not propose to agree to what the noble and learned Lord (Lord Ashbourne) suggests—namely, the omission of my noble friend's words when we come to them. We do not think it would be reasonable to do what would be in effect turning the Local Government Board into the council; that is to say, to allow it to certify institutions of all kinds with which it has no sort of connection. I do not know whether Lord Ampthill is prepared to agree to the modified form of Amendment suggested by the Lord President, but if he is he will be able to allow the noble and learned Lord's Amendment now before the Committee to pass, because it is really part of our Amendment. Of course, if he objects in toto to any change in the Bill, he would be right in speaking now in order to express his views.

LORD BURGHCLERE thought there was a good deal of point in Lord Ampthill's contention, because if the Committee accepted the Amendment of Lord Ashbourne as it stood and did not eventually adopt the Amendment of the Lord President they would be placed in a position of great difficulty. He therefore suggested that Lord Ashbourne should withdraw his Amendment and allow the Lord President's Amendment to be moved in the form in which it stood on the Paper.

THE LORD CHAIRMAN: I take it that Lord Ashbourne will withdraw his Amendment.

LORD ASHBOURNE: Very well.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

*VISCOUNT WOLVERHAMPTON then moved to leave out "a Poor Law institution recommended by the Local Government Board" in order to insert "an institution which the Local Government Board recommend and certify to be wholly or partly maintained out of rates."

Amendment moved—

"In page 5, lines 16 and 17, to leave out the words 'a Poor Law institution recommended by the Local Government Board,' and to insert the words 'an institution which the Local Government Board recommend and certify to be wholly or partly maintained out of rates.'"
—(Viscount Wolverhampton.)

LORD ASHBOURNE intimated that, as the Lord President and the Leader of the House held that it was desirable that these words should be inserted, and as the noble Lord in charge of the Bill agreed, he would not press his opposition.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY regretted the insertion of the proposed words for the reason which Lord Ampthill had given for supporting their insertion. He thought there ought to be some body superior to the Council in order to secure that a proper hospital should not be boycotted on account of professional jealousies.

LORD AMPHILL said that Clause 10 established the Privy Council as the authority superior to the Nursing Council, and in any case it was best not to anticipate that unfair and invidious distinctions would be made.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY hardly thought Clause 10 covered the point. No doubt Clause 10 gave the Privy Council a general power to control the regulations made under that clause; but Clause 11 contained a specific enactment which no regulations made by the Privy Council would be allowed to overcome. There certainly ought to be some authority with the right of jurisdiction in the case of institutions rashly or unfairly excluded by the Nursing Council. He suggested that the noble Lord in charge of the Bill should consider whether the Privy Council should not be inserted in place of the Local Government Board.

Amendment moved—

"In page 5, line 17, after the word 'institution,' to insert the words 'or institutions,' and after the word 'Board,' to insert the words 'of England, Ireland, or Scotland.'"—(Lord Ashbourne.)

*THE LORD CHAIRMAN: Is this a consequential Amendment?

On Question, Amendment agreed to.

LORD ASHBOURNE desired before the Committee passed from Clause 11, to ask the attention of the Lord President to one particular matter. There were, he said, a number of nurses in Ireland at the present moment who had worked for some considerable time under the certificate of the Local Government Board. Clause 11 was framed with a view of saving the status of existing nurses, and he would be glad if the Lord President would consider before the next stage of the Bill whether words could not be inserted which would save the right to go on the register of nurses at present certified by the Local Government Board.

*VISCOUNT WOLVERHAMPTON assured the noble and learned Lord that the point should receive consideration before the Report Stage.

LORD AMPHILL said the Committee had been rushed into an acceptance of the last Amendment, moved by Lord Ashbourne, on the assurance of the Lord Chairman that it was consequential. It was consequential, but consequential upon an Amendment which had been withdrawn—that was, so far as the first part of it was concerned. As to the second part of the Amendment, inserting after the word "Board," the words "of England, Ireland or Scotland," that matter had been disposed of by the definition clause carried on the Motion of the Lord President of the Council. Lord Ashbourne's Amendment, therefore, was not necessary, but he (Lord Ampthill) had no opportunity of intervening before it was passed.

THE LORD CHAIRMAN: It can be put right on Report.

Clause 11, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 12:

LORD ASHBOURNE said he understood that the principle of his Amendment to this clause was accepted by the Lord President. It was really consequential.

Amendment moved—

"In page 5, line 25, after the word 'hospital' to insert the words 'or of hospitals.'"—(Lord Ashbourne.)

LORD AMPHILL, in expressing his agreement with the Amendment, explained that though they seemed trivial

these words met an important case. The tendency of hospitals was to specialise, to have special hospitals for special diseases, and the consequence was that a fully-trained nurse had to undergo her training at more than one hospital. The provision as it stood might be read to require that she must have a certificate from one hospital only. The words which their Lordships had already inserted in the Bill and which it was now proposed to add in Clause 12 met this difficulty—a difficulty, which he understood, would arise more particularly in Ireland.

LORD AMPHILL said the clause provided for the payment by every registered nurse of a fee of 2s. 6d. before 13th January in each year, and if a nurse made default, his or her name "shall" be removed from the register, but "may" be restored in certain circumstances. He moved to substitute "may" for "shall" in the first case and "shall" for "may" in the second. He pointed out that no latitude was given in the case of a nurse living abroad. He thought the removal of a name should be discretionary and the restoration of the same obligatory.

Amendment moved—

"In page 6, line 17, to leave out the word 'shall,' and to insert the word 'may,' and in line 18, to leave out the word 'may,' and to insert the word 'shall.'"—(Lord Amphil.)

LORD BALFOUR OF BURLEIGH thought that if the restoration was to be made, as declared in the clause, on proof that the failure to pay was due to inadvertence or mistake or on other satisfactory explanation, it should remain discretionary.

LORD AMPHILL said he was going to ask their Lordships, without notice, to leave out the last sentence of the section.

THE EARL OF CREWE : I do not feel sure that that would be quite a safe course to take, because it might almost involve the restoration of the name of a nurse whom it was undesirable to restore for other reasons. I think it would be far better to change "shall" to "may" in the first case, but to leave "may" in the second case.

LORD AMPHILL expressed his willingness to bow to the opinion of the Lord Privy Seal in the matter, and amended his Amendment accordingly by deleting the second half.

Clause 17 :

LORD AMPHILL moved to amend the provision enacting a penalty in the case of anyone not registered under the Bill who, after the commencement of the Act, knowingly used the title "registered nurse." He moved to substitute for the word; "after the commencement of this Act" the words "after the publication of the first Annual Register of Nurses." The expression now in the clause was a little vague, and he thought it would be an improvement to define more accurately the precise moment of time.

Amendment moved—

LORD AMPTHILL had an Amendment on the Paper to Clause 20. The clause provided that—

“ Before suspending or removing any nurse's name from the register on account of breach of any rules or misconduct, the Council shall send to such nurse a statement in writing by registered letter, of the breach or misconduct imputed to him or her, and shall afford the nurse an opportunity of giving an explanation in writing or in person ; ” and the Amendment proposed to add at the end of the clause the words—

He said that on further consideration, he was very much inclined to ask their Lordships' permission not to move this Amendment. It had been represented to him from various quarters that it was desired, both by doctors and nurses, that a provision of this kind should be inserted ; but he now felt that the point was amply met by the right of appeal accorded in Clause 21, and it seemed to him very possible that an addition of this kind to the clause might suggest the employment of counsel and be a very considerable embarrassment to the Nursing Council. If, therefore, their Lordships had no objection he would not move the Amendment.

LORD ASHBOURNE, who had a similar Amendment on the Paper, said that unless he heard some further reason from the Lord President of the Council he would move his Amendment. He did not wish to encourage the incurring of legal costs, but it might happen that a nurse's character and status were at stake, and she might be ruined if she had not an opportunity of making her case. It might be that she was unable to do it herself, and there should be a provision that in such circumstances she might have the benefit of professional assistance. He, therefore, thought it reasonable to insert the proposed words.

Amendment moved—

“ In page 7, line 35, after the word ' person,' to insert the words ' or by legal representation if he or she so desires.' ”—(Lord Ashbourne.)

*VISCOUNT WOLVERHAMPTON said the Government took the view which Lord Ampthill had expressed, that the insertion of these words would considerably add to the cost of the procedure and involve a sort of legal trial in every case. Moreover, the Bill already provided for an appeal to a proper Court, where the matter would be fully considered.

LORD ASHBOURNE intimated that he would not press his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 20 agreed to.

Clause 21 :

LORD ASHBOURNE moved to amend this clause, which ran—

“ Any registered nurse aggrieved by a decision of the Council removing his or her name from the register within three months from the notification of such decision may appeal therefrom to the High Court of Justice in England and Wales, and to the Lord Ordinary officiating on the Bills in the Court of Session in Scotland, and such appeal shall be final.”

He proposed to insert, after the word “therefrom,” the words “according to his or her registered place of residence, either” and to insert, after the word “Wales,” the words “or to the High Court of Justice in Ireland.” This was a matter of machinery, and his Amendment provided that regard should be had to the registered place of residence.

Amendment moved—

“ In page 7, line 39, after the word ' therefrom,' to insert the words ' according to his or her registered place of residence, either,' and after the word 'Wales,' to insert the words 'or to the High Court of Justice in Ireland.'"

—(Lord Ashbourne.)

LORD AMPTHILL was disposed to accept the Amendment if the noble and learned Lord persisted in it, but ventured to suggest a difficulty that might arise. A nurse who had given her permanent residence as in Ireland, but who happened for the time being to be attending a case in England, would be compelled, under Lord Ashbourne's Amendment, to appeal to the High Court of Justice in Ireland. In such a case the provision would constitute a great inconvenience.

LORD ASHBOURNE said the Amendment had been drafted after full consideration and on the advice of a high legal authority.

*VISCOUNT WOLVERHAMPTON recognised the difficulty to which Lord Ampthill had called attention, and asked whether it would not meet the case if an alternative were given to the appellant to go to any one of the three Courts. It would obviously be unfair to compel a nurse who was at the moment living in Ireland, but whose registered address was in England, to come over to England to maintain the appeal, and vice versa. Perhaps the noble and learned Lord would consider the point. He was sure their only desire was to do what was right in the interests of those concerned.

LORD BALFOUR OF BURLEIGH said that as the clause stood the nurse might appeal to the High Court of Justice in England and Wales and to the Lord Ordinary officiating on the Bills in the Court of Session in Scotland. The whole drafting of the Clause required reconsideration.

*VISCOUNT WOLVERHAMPTON expressed the opinion that an appeal to the County Court would meet the case.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY thought the Lord President's previous suggestion—namely, that the appellant should have power to go to any one of the three Courts—the right one. He hoped that on Report the Lord President would deal with the matter in that way. The residence of the nurse was not a material matter.

LORD ASHBOURNE thought it would be wiser to leave the words out at this stage, and consider the matter further before Report.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Drafting Amendment agreed to.

Amendment moved—

"In line 2, after the word 'Scotland,' to insert the words 'and to the High Court of Justice in Ireland.'"—(Viscount Wolverhampton.)

LORD BALFOUR OF BURLEIGH questioned whether the word "and" in the Amendment should not be "or."

THE EARL OF CREWE: I think "and" is used before in the clause, and erroneously. It should be "or" in each case.

*VISCOUNT WOLVERHAMPTON: I will carefully consider the drafting before the Report stage.

Clause 21, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 22 agreed to.

Clause 23:

Amendment moved—

"To leave out Clause 23."—(Viscount Wolverhampton.)

On Question, Amendment agreed to.

Clause 24 agreed to.

LORD AMPTHILL moved the addition of the following new clause: "This Act shall not be construed to affect or apply to the gratuitous nursing of the sick by friends or members of a family, and also it shall not apply to any person attending the sick for hire, but who does not in any way assume to be a registered nurse under this Act." He was doubtful as to the expediency of introducing this clause, and he was not satisfied with the wording, but it had been strongly desired by some members of the medical profession and by authorities in Ireland. He did not think there was anything in the Bill to suggest that gratuitous nursing would be affected, but he invited an opinion from the Committee.

Amendment moved—

“To insert the following new clause: ‘This Act shall not be construed to affect or apply to the gratuitous nursing of the sick by friends or members of a family, and also it shall not apply to any person attending the sick for hire, but who does not in any way assume to be a registered nurse under this Act.’”—(Lord Ampthill.)

THE EARL OF MAYO suggested that better words would be: “This Act shall not apply to or affect nursing of the sick by any person not registered under the Act, and who does not in any way assume to be a registered nurse.” There was a strong feeling in regard to nursing by nuns in hospitals. It was a delicate subject to approach, but he thought that words should show that the Act cast no slur on nurses not on the register.

*VISCOUNT WOLVERHAMPTON was inclined to think that danger of a misunderstanding of the Act as interfering with gratuitous nursing was imaginary. He could not consent to the Amendment without further consideration.

THE EARL OF MAYO agreed with the Lord President that the danger was, perhaps, imaginary, but said that imaginary dangers in Ireland very often worked against the beneficial operation of an Act of Parliament, and they wished to avoid that in this case.

LORD BURGHCLERE thought it was a matter that might be dealt with in the definition clause.

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE: So far as I am able to understand the subject before us, these words are really quite unnecessary, and I should venture to suggest that they were not only unnecessary but somewhat misleading. There is nothing in the Bill, as I find it, which could possibly affect or apply to gratuitous nursing by members of a family or others, and if we insert these words we suggest that there is something in the Bill which it does not contain. My noble friend was, evidently, by his language, not much enamoured of his own Amendment, and I venture to advise him not to press it.

LORD ASHBOURNE said the Bill was popular with nurses, but to avoid mistaken ideas getting about, it would be well that words should be introduced making it abundantly plain that non-registered nurses were absolutely free to follow their calling.

THE EARL OF CREWE: I have no objection whatever to this matter being considered again on Report, but I find myself in general agreement with the noble Marquess on the Front Opposition Bench. It seems to me that the insertion of words of a kindly and consoling character, to reassure people who do not read the Act of Parliament and do not know the law, is a practice which ought as far as possible to be avoided, and I hope the matter will be allowed to drop.

LORD AMPHILL also had the following new clause on the Paper—

“Nothing contained in this Act shall be considered as conferring any authority to practise medicine or to undertake the treatment or cure of disease.”

He said it was of the same character as the clause which had just been under discussion, and was for the purpose of addressing what the noble Earl the Leader of the House had called kindly and consoling words to the medical profession. His own view was that the clause did not seem necessary, and as he took it that that was the sense of the Committee he would not move it.

Title:—

Amendment moved—

“In page 1, to leave out the words ‘qualifications of trained nurses, and to provide for their registration,’ and to insert the words ‘registration of nurses.’”—(Viscount Wolverhampton.)

On Question, Amendment agreed to.

* Standing Committee negatived: The Report of Amendments to be received on Monday next, and Bill to be printed as amended. [No. 210].

IRISH LOANS—RETURN.

THE EARL OF MAYO: My Lords, I rise to ask His Majesty's Government whether the Return as to loans contracted by local authorities in Ireland, etc., ordered to be laid before the House on the 21st July last has yet been furnished. I am told that the Return is likely to be laid upon the Table in dummy to-morrow, but we do not want it in dummy; we want the real thing. There is a Bill shortly to come before your Lordships' House dealing with the housing of the working-classes in Ireland, and it is most important that this Return should be laid on the Table before that discussion is taken. I am told, also, that the delay is due to the printers in Ireland. This is not the first time that we have had to complain of that sort of thing. The Return was ordered to be laid before the House on 21st July, and surely plenty of time has elapsed to enable a Return of that sort to be printed. I see the noble Lord, Lord Denman, in his place, and I should like to ask if there is any chance of our having the Return before the Bill to which I have referred comes up for consideration in Committee.

LORD DENMAN: The noble Earl has been misinformed with regard to the Return in question. It was laid on the Table on Friday, and was sent to Ireland to be printed on that day. I cannot tell the noble Earl when we shall get the Return back from the printers—that really is not my business—but I hope it will be here to-morrow. It was an extremely complicated Return, and I can assure the noble Earl that no time was lost in its preparation. In case the Return is not back from the printers in time, I would suggest that the noble Earl or any other Peer interested should call at the Irish Office and look at the copy, of which they can make any use they wish in the discussion on the Housing Bill.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS CIRCULATED WITH THE VOTES.

Persons under Police Protection in Ireland.

MR. LONSDALE (Armagh, Mid): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland what was the number of persons receiving constant police protection by patrols throughout Ireland on the last day of each month from January to September, 1908.

31st January -	54	216
29th February -	61	217
31st March -	60	225
30th April -	63	228
31st May -	70	232
30th June -	71	238
31st July -	83	246
31st August -	89	244
30th September -	104	252

Treatment of the Imprisoned Suffragists.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL (Donegal, S.): To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what modifications, if any, have been made in the treatment of the ladies now undergoing terms of imprisonment for offences in connection with the women suffrage agitation as compared with the treatment to which ladies undergoing imprisonment for such offences on former occasions have been subjected; were these ladies, or any of them, as in the former cases, searched by female warders and divested of all clothing during that search; are they kept in solitude for twenty-three hours out of the twenty-four, and is the twenty-fourth hour of recreation allocated half to attendance in chapel and half to exercise in the prison yard; have they, or any of them, been compelled to wear prison garb, and has this prison dress in any cases been previously worn by the ordinary class of women convicts, the dress being in actual contact with the skin; are they permitted to send or to receive letters or to be visited, and are they supplied with books, and, if so, at what time are they permitted to read them; and whether, having regard to the intimation that consideration would be given to the question whether the prison conditions would be relaxed or modified in cases in which the offence did not fall within the category of ordinary crimes, he will now state what steps, if any, have been taken to lighten the severity of the prison regime in the case of these ladies.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Gladstone.) Certain changes have been made at Holloway for all female prisoners in the second division, and are now in operation. They are briefly as follows: (a) A chair with a back has been placed in each cell instead of the stool usually provided; (b) Warm water for washing is supplied to those who desire it, with the medical officer's permission; (c) Visits are now received in a special room and not in the usual visiting box; (d) Work is carried on in association; (e) Books are allowed to be changed more frequently. With regard to the suffragist prisoners in particular, the reply to the Question is as follows: They were all searched on reception, but were not divested of all clothing during that search. They are not kept in solitude for twenty-three hours out of the twenty-four. They go to chapel for about twenty-five minutes every week-day, and about two and three-quarter hours on Sunday. They are occupied about five hours daily at associated labour, and they take exercise for one full hour every day. They wear the prison dress of the second division, which is of a different colour from that worn by other prisoners. In every case the underclothing has been new, while the outer clothing, if not absolutely new, has been previously worn only by suffragist prisoners. They are allowed letters and visits in accordance with the rules for second division prisoners, namely, to receive one visit in each month, and to write and receive one letter in each month, but special letters and visits are permitted if any emergency arises. They have a liberal supply of books, and are allowed to read them at any time during the day, or evening up to eight o'clock, when they are not engaged in work.

Hours of Duty at Lurgan Post Office.

MR. MOORE (Armagh, N.): To ask the Postmaster-General whether he is aware that the duties at the Lurgan office are principally late evening and night, and cover an attendance of fourteen and a half hours; whether the male staff do not average one month's early evening relief during the year; whether, in official evidence given before the Hobhouse Committee, it was stated that at the last revision it was arranged to withdraw women and employ men only; whether the female staff is practically equal with the male; and whether he will make inquiry into these duties with a view to improvement.

(Answered by Mr. Sydney Buxton.) The inquiries which are being made in the matter are not yet completed, and I will communicate with the hon. Member as soon as I am in possession of the facts.

Recommendation of Committee on Irish Forestry.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND (Clare, E.): To ask the Vice-President of the Department of Agriculture (Ireland) whether the Government intend to carry out the recommendations of the Departmental Committee in Ireland on Forestry.

(Answered by Mr. T. W. Russell.) The Department are in communication with the Treasury on the subject, but are not yet in a position to make any definite announcement.

Reduction of Sentences on Bombay Rioters.

MR. REES (Montgomery Boroughs): To ask the Under-Secretary of State for India whether the Government of Bombay has commuted the sentence of transportation passed on Bal Gangadhar Tilak from transportation to simple imprisonment, and has reduced the sentences passed upon the persons convicted of participation in the recent riots in Bombay.

Indian Criminal Appellate Judges.

MR. REES: To ask the Under-Secretary of State for India whether he can inform the House what answer was returned by the High Court of Calcutta to the communication it received from the Government of India bringing under its notice the representation of the Behar Planters Association, arising out of the murder of Mr. Bloomfield, that Criminal Appellate Courts, whose judgments are final, should invariably be composed of Judges who are thoroughly experienced and are well versed in the Indian criminal law.

(Answered by Mr. Buchanan.) The Secretary of State has no information as regards the correspondence referred to between the Government of India and the Calcutta High Court.

Memorial of Mr. C. W. Allan, Indian Forest Service.

SIR SEYMOUR KING (Hull, Central): To ask the Under-Secretary of State for India whether the Secretary of State has now considered the Memorial addressed to him by Mr. C. W. Allan, an extra Deputy Conservator of Forests in the Burma provincial service; whether Mr. Allan, after passing through the college at Dehra Dun, joined the Indian Forest Service on 1st February, 1887, at a time when it was provided by Section 21 of the then Forest Department Code that, after five years approved service as Sub-assistant Conservator of Forests, he would be drafted into the upper controlling staff; whether he is aware that in 1891 the Government issued a new Forest Department reorganisation scheme debarring all officers thenceforward appointed in India from promotion to the upper controlling staff; that, having done four years of admittedly approved service, the new scheme was by ex post facto ruling applied to Mr. Allan's case; whether he is aware that recently the Secretary of State for India has sanctioned the transfer of Mr. Shrish Chandra Chakrabatti from the provincial to the Imperial engineering service on the ground that, as he had actually entered the Sibpur Engineering College before the issue of the orders closing the Imperial service to students of Indian engineering colleges, he had an equitable right to an appointment in the Imperial service; will he state on what ground, in an analagous case, Mr. Allan has been refused similar treatment; and whether the Government of India will be directed to remedy the grievance from which Mr. Allan is suffering.

(Answered by Mr. Buchanan.) The Secretary of State has considered Mr. Allan's Memorial and has decided not to interfere with the orders of the Government of India refusing to promote him to the Imperial Forest Service. The Government of India have found that the rules in force in 1887 did not guarantee to Mr. Allan that he would be drafted into the upper controlling staff after five years approved service, but merely made him eligible for selection for such promotion on the ground of special merit. In the reorganisation of 1891 it was held, after consideration, that Mr. Allan had no claim as of right to be promoted to the Imperial Service. He was therefore placed in the Provincial Service, and the Government of India, having regard to his training and abilities have declined to promote him to the Imperial Service. The case of Mr. Shrish Chandra Chakrabatti stands on quite a different footing and was governed by other rules.

Trypanosomiasis in Uganda.

MR. REES: To ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies how much of the grant-in-aid of £85,000 from the Imperial Exchequer to Uganda Protectorate in 1907-8 was expended on preventive measures taken against the spread of trypanosomiasis and syphilis; and how much of the like grant of £25,000 to Nyasaland was expended in preventing the spread of the former disease towards the latter Protectorate.

(Answered by Colonel Seely.) A sum of about £11,000 was provided in the Uganda Estimates for 1907-8 for the purpose of combating trypanosomiasis. An expert was sent out during the same year to report on the question of syphilis. His report has now been received and considered, and a sum of £2,000 has been inserted in the Estimates for the current year for the purpose of providing better and more systematic medical treatment for the natives who are suffering from the disease. With regard to Nyasaland, efforts were directed during 1907-8 to ascertaining the distribution of trypanosomiasis in the countries bordering on the Protectorate and of the various kinds of tse-tse fly within the Protectorate. This information appears to be an essential preliminary to any proper scheme of prevention.

Native Protectorates—Payment of Taxes in Kind.

MR. REES: To ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether the tax payable by natives in Protectorates should not be paid in kind in order to the development of local crops and products, rather than in money, to earn which they have to some extent to emigrate to more or less distant territories.

(Answered by Colonel Seely.) In West African Protectorates there is but little direct taxation, and payment is accepted in kind wherever coin does not circulate freely. In Nyasaland and the other Protectorates north of the Zambesi, and also in the Bechuanaland Protectorate, the hut tax is payable in coin, but power is given, under varying conditions, to the collector to accept stock or produce in lieu. In South Africa the hut tax, which is the usual form of direct taxation, is collected in money, but it is a form of taxation which has been in force for many years and is well understood by the natives. The natives in the East Africa Protectorate and Uganda can pay their hut tax in kind or money, but now that the natives are getting more money payment in the latter is becoming more general.

Railway Rate on Spirits in the Gold Coast.

MR. ARMITAGE (Leeds, Central): To ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies why there has been a reduction in the railway rate on spirits in the Gold Coast, and what the reduction amounted to.

(Answered by Colonel Seely.) There has been no alteration in the railway rate on spirits in the Gold Coast since May, 1907, when the special rate of 3s. 9d. a ton was abolished and spirits were placed in Class I. They are now carried at the highest rate charged on other Class I. articles, namely, 2s. 6d. per ton for the first 50 miles, 2s. 3d. per ton for the next 50, 2s. per ton for the next 50, and 1s. 9d. a ton for mileage beyond 150 miles.

Land Acquired for Small Holdings.

MR. R. HARCOURT (Montrose Burghs): To ask the hon. Member for South Somerset, as representing the President of the Board of Agriculture, if he can state the acreage of land actually acquired or in process of acquirement under the Small Holdings and Allotments Act by the county councils of England and Wales, severally.

(Answered by Sir Edward Strachey.) Numerous negotiations for the acquisition of land are going on of which we are not fully informed, and it is not possible therefore to give accurate information under this head. But some 12,000 acres have actually been acquired, about 600 acres of which are in Wales and the remainder in England.

The Movement of Swine.

MR. FIELD (Dublin, St. Patrick): To ask the hon. Member for South Somerset as representing the President of the Board of Agriculture, what basis there was for issuing the Swine Fever (Regulation of Movement) Order, 1908, what was the object of the same, how many local authorities enforced it, and in how many instances cancellments of the original Order were issued.

(Answered by Sir Edward Strachey.) The need for the uniformity and simplification of the conditions attaching to the movement of swine for slaughter has been for some time past strongly urged, especially by meat traders, and the object of the issue of the Order, to which my hon. friend refers, was to give effect to those representations. The Order applies to the whole of Great Britain with the exception of three boroughs, which are subject to special Orders. The original Order was superseded and the new Order imposed in eleven districts.

Recruiting of Provincial Telephonists.

MR. SEDDON (Lancashire, Newton): To ask the Postmaster-General whether he will state the manner in which telephonists employed in provincial offices are recruited; whether local postmasters have the power of selection delegated to them; and whether, if this is the case, any steps are taken to eliminate preference being shown to individuals.

(Answered by Mr. Sydney Buxton.) Telephonists in provincial post offices are recruited from among candidates whose names have been recorded by the local postmasters; and, provided they are suitable and eligible under the regulations, they are selected, on the occurrence of vacancies, in the order in which they have made application. I have no reason to suppose that postmasters show improper preference.

School Attendances—Time occupied travelling to Swimming-Baths.

MR. HORNIMAN (Chelsea): To ask the President of the Board of Education whether his attention has been called to the fact that under the present regulations of the Board of Education the time occupied by children in travelling to and from the baths is not reckoned as part of the minimum time for school attendance, which must not be less than two hours for secular instruction to enable a grant to be paid, and that consequently the present regulations prevent many children from receiving instruction in the healthy and useful art of swimming; and whether he will consider the advisability of amending the regulations accordingly.

(Answered by Mr. Runciman.) The Board have decided that a reasonable time spent by scholars in going to and from swimming-baths may be reckoned as part of the minimum time required for an attendance.

The Unemployed and the Construction of Motor Roads.

MR. H. H. MARKS (Kent, Thanet): To ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he will consider the possibility of utilising some portion of the supply of unemployed labour now available upon the construction of motor roads throughout the country to accommodate the growing motor traffic.

(Answered by Mr. John Burns.) Parliament has not at present authorised the construction of any roads for the exclusive use of motor traffic. In the absence of the legislation necessary to give such authority I am afraid it would not be practicable to adopt the suggestion in the Question.

Expenses of the Clerical Staff of the Edmonton Urban District Council.

MR. H. H. MARKS: To ask the President of the Local Government Board whether the salaries paid to the clerical staff of the Edmonton Urban District Council amounts to £6,000 a year, which is equal to an 8d. rate; and, if so, whether he can take steps to urge upon the Edmonton Urban District Council the desirability of keeping clerical and official expenses within reasonable limits.

(Answered by Mr. John Burns.) According to a statement furnished to me by the clerk to the district council, the salaries of the officials and clerical staff of the council during the last financial year amounted to £5,891; but this sum includes the salaries of such officers as the road foreman, farm bailiff, and the superintendents of the baths, cemetery, and fire brigade, and also the salaries of the medical officer of health and inspector of nuisances, half of which are repaid by the county council. It will be seen, therefore, that a considerable part of the amount mentioned above is not expended on the clerical staff.

The Suffrage Disturbances—Cost of Extra Police.

MR. BERTRAM (Hertfordshire, Hitchin): To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he can state what was the cost of the special police protection afforded to the Palace of Westminster by reason of the suffragette demonstration directed against the House of Commons on Tuesday, 13th October last; and whether in the interests of the taxpayers, he will take any steps to recover any portion of this cost from the Women's Social and Political Union, which gave notice of and arranged the demonstration.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Gladstone.) I cannot say what was the total cost involved on the occasion in question. I know of no means of recovering any portion of this cost from the Women's Social and Political Union.

Franco-British Exhibition—Payment of Income-Tax by Foreign Stall-holders.

MR. H. H. MARKS: To ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he can now state the decision arrived at with reference to the payment of income-tax by foreign stall-holders at the Franco-British Exhibition.

(Answered by Mr. Lloyd-George.) As the result of inquiries which have been instituted, it would appear that no profits assessable for income-tax purposes have been made by foreign stall-holders at the Franco-British Exhibition.

QUESTIONS IN THE HOUSE.

War Office Extensions on Salisbury Plain.

MR. WALTER LONG (Dublin, S.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether it is proposed to acquire more land for military purposes in the neighbourhood of Salisbury Plain; and, if so, whether this House will have any opportunity to consider the matter before definite steps are taken.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (MR. HALDANE, Haddington): It is proposed to acquire an additional area of land adjoining existing War Department property on Salisbury Plain for the purpose of an artillery range. I do not think I should be carrying out the wishes of the House when it passed the Territorial and Reserve Forces Act if I failed to take such steps as were essential for securing the efficiency of the Territorial Force. The immediate provision of an artillery range in the South of England is an absolute necessity, and I should not consider myself justified in agreeing to any delay with regard to it. The House will have an opportunity of discussing this purchase on next year's Estimates, but I do not think I should be doing what is right or what the public interest requires were I to suspend action until that time.

MR. WALTER LONG pressed for an answer whether the House would have an opportunity of discussing the question whether the land selected by the Government was the most suitable for the purpose, and whether land of a more suitable character could not be obtained without carrying out a wholesale system of evictions.

MR. HALDANE said that he had carefully inquired into all the circumstances, and he was satisfied that the mass of public opinion was entirely in favour of the action the department had taken. He could not suspend what was necessary action in behoof of the Territorial Forces.

MR. WALTER LONG asked whether the House was to understand that this proposal involving grave hardship was to be carried out without an opportunity being given to the House to discuss it.

MR. HALDANE said that it was a question of purchasing four houses and, 5,500 acres from willing sellers.

MR. WALTER LONG: No.

MR. HALDANE said as far as he knew this was the case; at any rate, no notice had been given of any serious opposition. He was satisfied that in no other way could he provide for the efficiency of the Territorial Forces, and with the hope of progress being made before next summer. The War Office had taken the utmost pains to provide for those who wanted small holdings and compensation for those affected.

MR. AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN (Worcestershire, E.): On what Vote is this expenditure to be charged?

MR. HALDANE said that the purchases would be made under powers contained in the Public Works Loans Act of last year.

MR. WALTER LONG: Are we to understand that the Government proposes to carry this out without giving the House any opportunity of discussing it until the whole operation has been completed?

MR. HALDANE: The House passed the Public Works Loans Act last summer for the very purpose of enabling the Territorial Associations to acquire ranges. It is under those powers that we are proceeding. We are taking every step in our power to prevent hardship. Everywhere the War Office goes for land it is met with this kind of objection and prices are raised. I must really be allowed some discretion. I am blamed at one moment for not going fast enough, and whenever I move I am pulled up.

MR. GOULDING (Worcester): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that great distress exists among aged agricultural labourers, who have lost their avocation by reason of the purchase, and are at the present time in want?

MR. HALDANE: The hon. Member appears to be a little mixed. The purchase has not yet been carried out.

MR. GOULDING: Will the right hon. Gentleman make inquiries as to whether the negotiations carried out by him on behalf of the War Office have not already led to the dismissal of a great number of aged agricultural labourers; and if so, whether, when awarding compensation, he will see that compensation is paid to them?

*MR. SPEAKER: If the hon. Member will look at the Paper he will see that he is getting a very long way from the Question.

MR. AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN: May I ask a further Question?

*MR. SPEAKER: We have had eight supplementary Questions already.

Territorial Artillery.

CAPTAIN FABER (Hampshire, Andover): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether he can state the actual number of guns already issued for Territorial Artillery brigades compared with the number laid down.

MR. HALDANE: The total number of guns and howitzers required to equip the Territorial Artillery Brigades, is 728, of which 263 have been issued.

CAPTAIN FABER: When will the remainder be issued?

[The reply was inaudible.]

Oats for Army Horses.

*CAPTAIN FABER: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War if he can state whether oats are issued in the same year as they are grown to horses in the Army; and, if so, at what particular date.

MR. HALDANE: Oats can be issued in the same year as they are grown to horses in the Army, provided that they comply with the contract specification which governs the quality. No particular date for the issue of oats is specified.

*CAPTAIN FABER: Is it not the fact that oats are not really fit to use before 1st January?

MR. HALDANE: That is a question for the Army Service Corps experts. They are better judges than I am.

*CAPTAIN FABER: Will the right hon. Gentleman urge the contractors not to issue damp oats as I am assured they are doing?

Edinburgh Cavalry Barracks.

MR. C. E. PRICE (Edinburgh, Central): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether the Heriot Trust of Edinburgh has agreed to sell the Redford estate for the purpose of erecting a cavalry barracks; and, if so, will he press forward the work with all possible speed in order to give employment to the large number of men in the building trade who are at present out of employment in Edinburgh.

MR. PIRIE (Aberdeen, N.): Before the right hon. Gentleman answers this Question, may I ask whether he will take into consideration the fact that this is a national matter, and not a local one, merely fulfilling an obligation long 'overdue to Scotland and therefore will he distribute the work regardless of any local jealousies?

MR. HALDANE: In this case, as in the case of Salisbury Plain, I have received a storm of protests against the selection of the locality.

MR. PIRIE: I do not protest at all.

MR. HALDANE: I am glad to be able to inform my hon. friend that negotiations with the Heriot Trustees are proceeding satisfactorily. I can assure him that as soon as the purchase of the site is completed no time will be lost in setting to work; but as the hon. Member is aware, before building operations can be actually started plans have to be prepared, contracts have to be placed, and other similar arrangements have to be made. All this will take a certain amount of time, and I should not like to promise that the building can be begun before I am certain that these preparations have been thoroughly made, though preparation of the site, road-making, and such work may commence earlier.

Bengal Administration.

MR. REES (Montgomery Boroughs): I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for India whether the Anglo-Indian Association of Calcutta has represented to the Government of Bengal that the separation of judicial and executive functions seems likely not only to be unpopular amongst the great masses who have never demanded it, but also to be fraught with great harm; and, if so, whether this representation will be duly considered before the present experiment is extended.

THE UNDER-SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (MR. BUCHANAN, Perthshire, E.): The Secretary of State has no information as to the representation in question, but the Government of India will no doubt give it due consideration in formulating their proposals. No effect has yet been given to the experimental scheme to which I understand the hon. Member to refer.

Punjab Education Department.

DR. RUTHERFORD (Middlesex, Brentford): I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for India whether he is aware that several Europeans and Eurasians have been taken into the provincial branch of the Punjab Education Department within the last year, and that they have been placed over the heads of a number of Indians in the matter of pay and seniority to the detriment of the prospects of the latter; did these Indian gentlemen protest against such treatment; and, if so, with what result.

MR. BUCHANAN: No record of any such appointments can be found in the official lists received up to the present time. But if the hon. Member can quote specific cases, the Secretary of State will inquire.

MR. REES: Is it not the fact that the natives of India do not believe in our system of education and are very bad agents for carrying it out?

MR. BUCHANAN: I do not see how that arises out of the Question. The provincial branch is a branch of the service set apart for natives.

Europeans in the Punjab Municipal Service.

DR. RUTHERFORD: I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for India whether the Secretary of State is aware that the number of Europeans in the Punjab municipalities' service has increased within the last ten years; that out of five appointments carrying salaries of over £15 per month in the municipality of Lahore not one is held by an Indian, and that out of twelve appointments with salaries of £8 a month only two are held by Indians; and whether this state of things has the approval of the Secretary of State for India.

MR. BUCHANAN: Municipal Committees in the Punjab under the Punjab Municipalities Act of 1891 appoint their own servants, and the Secretary of State has no detailed information as to the numbers, rates of pay, or nationalities of such employees. The Lahore Municipal Committee is composed of twenty Indians and ten Europeans. On the committees of other municipalities the Indian element is still more predominant. The Secretary of State does not feel called upon to express an opinion on the mode in which the committees exercise their powers.

Sirhind Canal—Water Rates.

SIR H. COTTON (Nottingham, E.): I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for India when the water rates were last raised on the Sirhind Canal in the Punjab; what the rates were before the enhancement and what they are now, and especially whether the rate for sugar cane was enhanced by 100 per cent.; and whether the area of sugar cane cultivation has since decreased on the land irrigated by that canal.

MR. BUCHANAN: The present rates came into force in 1905. It is difficult to compare them in detail with the rates previously in force, as the schedule is a lengthy one, and the two sets of rates were not framed on the same system. but the general effect was an increase of about 20 per cent. on the yield of the old rates. The old rate for sugar cane was 7 rupees, 8 annas, or 10s. the acre; the present rate is 10 rupees, or 13s. 4d. the acre in one zone, and 12 rupees, or 16s. in the other zone; the percentage of increase being 33 in the one case and 60 in the other. There has been some decrease in the sugar cane area on this canal since 1901-2, but in the Punjab generally the area under this crop has of late years decreased. The cane crop on the Sirhind Canal is relatively small to the total irrigated area.

Trinidad--Indentured Coolie Labour.

MR. SUMMERBELL (Sunderland): I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies if he is aware that the cost of introducing indentured coolies into Trinidad is about £27 per head; that towards such cost the employers requiring such labour only contribute about £5 per head, the remainder being made up by a contribution from general revenue of £9 and by an export tax on produce of £13; and, if so, whether he is prepared to take steps having for its object the placing of the entire charge for introducing such coolies on the employers who require such labour.

THE UNDER-SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Colonel SEELY, Liverpool, Abercromby): As my hon. friend was informed in reply to a similar Question on 27th March, 1907, the cost of importing indentured immigrants varies. In the last completed financial year it was between £27 and £28 per head. The sources from which this amount is made up are as stated in the Question. So far as we are aware the balance of opinion in the island seems to incline to a continuance of the present system, but the Secretary of State is prepared to address further inquiries on this subject to the Officer administering the Government.

Newfoundland Fisheries Settlement.

*SIR CHARLES W. DILKE (Gloucestershire, Forest of Dean): I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether Papers can be presented showing the present attitude of the Government of Newfoundland towards the recently concluded modus vivendi in the fishery question with the United States.

COLONEL SEELY: There are no Papers which can conveniently be laid at present, but I am glad to inform my right hon. friend that the Government of Newfoundland have expressed much gratification at the conclusion of the modus vivendi, and the revocation of the Order in Council of 9th September, 1907, which the acceptance of the modus vivendi by that Government has rendered possible.

British Indians in British Columbia.

MR. MITCHELL-THOMSON (Lanarkshire, N.W.): I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he has any information as to the intentions of the Dominion Government with regard to British Indians in British Columbia.

COLONEL SEELY: Proposals have been made for sending some of the East Indians now in British Columbia as free labourers to British Honduras, and it appears from Press telegrams that the Dominion Government are taking steps in this direction by sending two Indians to British Honduras to inquire into the practicability of the scheme.

In answer to a supplementary Question by Mr. Mitchell-Thomson—

COLONEL SEELY said he was awaiting a Report on the scheme, and some little time would elapse before that could be received.

Telegraphic Communication with Demerara and Trinidad.

MR. MITCHELL-THOMSON: I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies what progress has been made with regard to the improvement of telegraphic communication to Demerara and Trinidad.

COLONEL SEELY: Considerable progress has been made in the negotiations since I replied to the hon. Member's last question on this subject in July last, in fact I may say that they have been practically completed. The question of a site in Trinidad has, however, still to be settled by the local Government, some difficulty having arisen through the possibility that the new service may interfere with the existing service to Tobago. The Secretary of State in writing to Trinidad has expressed the hope that every effort will be made to establish direct communication with British Guiana by means of wireless telegraphy at an early date.

MR. MITCHELL-THOMSON: Can the hon. Gentleman say what is the rate for cable communication to British Guiana?

COLONEL SEELY said he would get the information for the hon. Member.

The All-Red Route.

MR. MITCHELL-THOMSON: I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies what is the present position with regard to the All-Red Route proposals.

COLONEL SEELY: No Report has yet been made by the Committee on the All-Red Route. The Committee are considering an Interim Report, but will be unable to report finally until certain further information has been obtained from the self-governing Dominions.

EARL WINTERTON (Sussex, Horsham): Can the hon. Gentleman give any indication when the Report is likely to be received? Will it be before Christmas?

COLONEL SEELY: I am afraid I cannot say at present.

Newfoundland Fisheries Dispute.

*SIR CHARLES W. DILKE (Gloucestershire, Forest of Dean): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he can give the House any information concerning the recent conclusion with the United States of a modus vivendi with regard to the Newfoundland fishery; and whether Papers can be presented showing the form in which the question is submitted to the Hague Tribunal.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir Edward Grey, Northumberland, Berwick): Full information with regard to the nature and effect of the modus vivendi was given in a statement communicated to the Press on 14th August last, to which I do not think that I can usefully add anything. With regard to the second portion of the Question, I would state that the terms of reference to arbitration of the fishery questions at issue are still under discussion, and it would, therefore, be premature to lay any Papers on the subject.

Macedonian Gendarmerie.

MR. PONSONBY (Stirling Burghs): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether any suggestion has been made for the reduction of the British officers attached to the Macedonian Gendarmerie; and, if so, whether he will take into consideration the importance of maintaining the whole staff of British officers whose services are still cordially welcomed by the Turkish Government.

SIR EDWARD GREY: The Turkish Government have been asked by the Powers whether they wish for the withdrawal of the foreign officers attached to the Macedonian Gendarmerie. No answer has yet been received. There is no intention of reducing any officers whose services the Turkish Government desire to retain.

MR. LYNCH (Yorkshire, W.R., Ripon): May I ask what course it has been decided to take with regard to the financial position?

SIR EDWARD GREY: I see nothing about that in the Question on the Paper.

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member should give notice of it.

Tong-Shan Engineering College.

MR. MITCHELL-THOMSON: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he has any information as to the dismissal of the English principal of the Tong-shan Engineering College without previous reference to the engineer-in-chief of the Northern Railways; and whether, seeing that the college is maintained from the earnings of a railway mortgaged to British bondholders, he will make inquiry as to the circumstances.

SIR EDWARD GREY: The facts of the case are as follows:—The principal of the college was engaged in 1905. By the terms of his engagement, three months' notice was to be given by either side to terminate it. About a month ago the principal received notice under this clause. His Majesty's Minister at Peking has been asked to intervene on the principal's behalf on the ground that six months' notice is usual, and Sir John Jordan has appealed to the Director-General of Railways in regard to the case. The matter is still under consideration.

British Employees on Chinese Northern Railways.

MR. MITCHELL-THOMSON: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether his attention has been called to the number of dismissals of British employees from the Chinese Northern Railways; whether Article 6 of the Loan Contract of 10th October, 1908, expressly restricted the right of dismissal to cases of incompetency and misconduct; and what steps His Majesty's Government propose to take, in view of the British financial interests involved in the railways, to prevent the persistent violation of this article.

SIR EDWARD GREY : I am informed that two traffic inspectors on the railway have received notices of dismissal, and Mr. Kinder, the Engineer-in-Chief, has protested to the Director against the step; but no official information has reached His Majesty's Minister in China either from Mr. Kinder or from the British and Chinese Corporation as agents of the bondholders. Sir John Jordan is, however, inquiring into the matter, and as to the bearing of Article 6 of the Loan Contract of 10th October, 1898, on these cases. The article in question provides that the principal members of the railway staff may, in the event of their misconduct or incompetency, be dismissed after consultation with the Chief Engineer.

The Dardanelles.

MR. LYNCH : I beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether, in the event of an agreement being reached between the Governments of Russia and Turkey for the passage of Russian warships from the Black Sea into the Mediterranean, His Majesty's Government will make it a condition of their assent to such an arrangement that our warships shall have similar rights of passage into the Black Sea; and whether, in the recent discussions that have taken place between His Majesty's Government and that of Russia, the Russian Government have been informed in this sense.

SIR EDWARD GREY : The question of the Straits is not included in any suggested programme for the Conference and it would in my opinion add to the difficulties of the situation if the discussion of subjects outside those with which we have immediately to deal were insisted upon. The hon. Member may rest assured that in any discussion about the opening of the Straits His Majesty's Government will see that British interests are not injuriously affected.

MR. LYNCH : Arising out of that answer, may I ask whether it is a fact that His Majesty's Government expressed the view that this is a matter which can be settled between Turkey and Russia; and that the Turkish Government demurred to that?

SIR EDWARD GREY : I do not desire to promote any discussion of the question of the Straits at this moment, when there are so many other things under discussion. I must decline to answer these questions piecemeal.

Old-Age Pensions.

*CAPTAIN FABER : I beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will state whether a man of over seventy years of age, having £800 stock in Consols producing an income of £20 a year, is eligible as an old-age pensioner for 5s. a week; and whether a man in receipt of a compassionate allowance of 13s. a week, which he has received for a year, is not eligible for any old-age pension whatever.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (MR. LLOYD-GEORGE, Carnarvon Boroughs) : On the assumption that the claimant has no other means, the Answer to the first Question is in the affirmative. The Answer to the second would, under the provisions of Section 4 of the Old-Age Pensions Act, depend upon whether there was, or was not, a reasonable expectation that the claimant would continue to receive the allowance during the succeeding year.

*CAPTAIN FABER : Cannot the right hon. Gentleman see his way to put a man who has been working all his life on an equal footing with those who happen to possess £800 worth of Consols?

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE : That is a very conjectural case, and one that is unlikely to happen.

CAPTAIN FABER : May I have an Answer to my Question?

[No Answer was returned.]

MR. STAVELEY-HILL (Staffordshire, Kingswinford) : I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether the receipt of sick pay by a member of a friendly society will be taken into account in considering the income of the person under the Old-Age Pensions Act.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: The matter is one for the pension committee to determine in accordance with the provisions of Section 4 (1) (a) of the Act upon the facts of each case.

MR. STAVELEY-HILL: Will instructions be given to the pension committees on this point?

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: I must ask for notice of that.

MR. STAVELEY-HILL: Will the right hon. Gentleman consider the desirability of obtaining a decision at once on this very important matter?

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: Each case will be decided by the pension committee as it arises on the facts.

MR. STAVELEY-HILL: I beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer whether his attention has been called to the conflicting instructions issued by the Local Government Board and the Commissioners of Inland Revenue with reference to the areas of the sub-committees and the districts of pension officers under the Old-Age Pensions Act; and whether he proposes to take any steps to bring these instructions into agreement with one another.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: I am not aware of any conflict. The administrative arrangements which have been adopted do not require that the areas served by pension officers should be co-terminous with those served by the pension committees, nor is it intended that this should invariably—or even usually—be the case.

MR. WALTER LONG: I beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer whether, having regard to the fact that under No. 35 of the Old-Age Pensions Regulations, 1908, a great deal of information will be required from boards of guardians and their officers as to whether relief has been given to applicants for old-age pensions, and also as to the mode of life of many such applicants, he will arrange that provision be made for payment for such information from the national Exchequer, as the Local Government Board have stated in a circular letter, addressed to boards of guardians, and dated 10th October, 1908, that it is understood that the pensions officers have no funds out of which such payments can be made.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: I am not prepared to propose a grant from the Exchequer for this purpose. In view of the enormous saving which will ultimately accrue to local rates from the diminution in the charge for poor relief to be expected from the inauguration of the pension scheme, I think it will be generally conceded that the ratepayer may reasonably be asked to bear the slight expenses incidental to supplying the information required.

LORD R. CECIL (Marylebone, E.) asked whether the effect of that arrangement would not be that while the pension officer was a representative of the Treasury he would receive payment from the ratepayers?

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: I do not think so.

LORD R. CECIL: I beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer whether it is intended to issue instructions to the pension officers directing them in reporting on the means of a claimant for an old-age pension not to take into consideration the fact that he occupies a cottage at a rent less than the full rack rent; and, if not, will he explain why.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: Pension officers have been instructed in calculating the means of a claimant to take into account, as provided in the Act, the yearly value of any benefit or privilege enjoyed by him. In regard to questions of rent such as that referred to by the noble Lord, the circumstances of the different cases are likely to be so widely divergent that it would not be practical to issue more specific instructions.

LORD R. CECIL: Have any specific instructions been given to the pension officers with regard to the valuation of rent?

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: I do not think there are any specific instructions bearing on that point.

MR. HAROLD COX (Preston): I beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer whether the Board of Inland Revenue has instructed the pension officers to take into account, in estimating the income of claimants, the value of free board, lodging, or clothing; whether the execution of this instruction will involve meticulous inquiries into the precise value of ordinary articles of food and clothing; and, if so, whether he proposes to direct the Board of Inland Revenue to issue a fresh set of secret instructions to pension officers to ignore food and clothing of less value than the equivalent of a capital sum of £30, so that poor people may not be deprived of their pensions by the meticulous inquiries of pension officers.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: The Answer to the first Question is in the affirmative; that to the second in the negative; the third does not arise.

MR. HAROLD COX: Do I understand the right hon. Gentleman to say that it is the duty of the pension officers to take into account the value of board and lodging, but that it is not their duty to make any inquiry as to the value?

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: That is certainly not what I said.

MR. HAROLD COX: I think it is.

MR. HAROLD COX: I beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer whether the general powers which a public department possesses to direct its own affairs would enable the Board of Inland Revenue to issue instructions to pension officers to report against the claim of any persons who were deemed by that Board to be unfit for pensions; and what means a pension committee has of compelling a pension officer to report in accordance with the terms of the Act instead of in obedience to the orders of the department.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: I presume that it would be within the power of the Board of Inland Revenue to issue such instructions to pension officers, but I would remind my hon. friend that the Board would be responsible for any action taken by their officers in accordance with their instructions, for which I, in my turn, should be answerable to Parliament. The pension officer has, under Section 7 (1) (b) of the Act and No. 11 (2) of the Regulations, a statutory duty "to procure any further information which it is in his power to procure in reference to any matter to be considered by the committee" if the committee require him to do so, and it would not be open to him to plead official instructions as an excuse for the neglect of that duty.

MR. HAROLD COX asked whether the pension committee could dismiss the officer if he disobeyed the law.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE said that statutory obligations were imposed upon him, and the officer was responsible to the Minister for refusing to carry out the law, while Parliament could call the Minister to account.

MR. HAROLD COX: That is just what I should like to do.

LORD R. CECIL: How is the House to make the Minister responsible unless the instructions are laid upon the Table of the House?

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: The Question can be raised on the Minister's salary.

*MR. FERBERT (Buckinghamshire, Wycombe): I beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he has caused any estimate to be made of the additional cost of old-age pensions due to the exclusion from calculation of the means of applicants of furniture up to £30, in accordance with the departmental instructions to pension officers, above what would have been the cost as sanctioned by Parliament under Section 4 of the Old-Age Pensions Act, which requires all furniture to be taken into account in calculating the means of applicants.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: I have no statistics of the value of furniture possessed by claimants to old-age pensions, and the original estimates of the scheme were based on the assumption that any property of this character, of which account would be taken in calculating the means of an applicant, would be so small in amount as not to affect appreciably the cost of the scheme.

*MR. HERBERT: I beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will issue instructions to pension officers to keep a record showing the number of persons who become eligible for old-age pensions by virtue of the exclusion from the calculation of their means of furniture under £30 in value who would not have been qualified if all furniture had been taken into account in accordance with Section 4 of the Old-Age Pensions Act, the number of persons who receive pensions at a higher rate, and the total additional cost.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: No, Sir. The cost of making the detailed valuations, which would be necessary in the case of every claimant, for compiling such a record, would be considerable, and I should not feel justified in asking Parliament to vote money for the purpose.

*MR. FERBERT: Will not the pension officers be obliged to make that valuation in any event? If they are to carry out the instructions and disregard the first £30 worth of furniture, and reckon the balance, how can they do that without making a valuation?

Income-Tax.

VISCOUNT CASTLEREAGH (Maidstone): I beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he is aware that unnecessary hardship is imposed on tradesmen by the enforcement of the production of a balance sheet for the purpose of assessing their incomes for income-tax; and whether he can see his way to limit the demands of the Commissioners in such cases to the production of a profit and loss account.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: I may perhaps be allowed to refer the noble Lord to a very full reply which I gave on this point on 19th May last in answer to a Question by my hon. friend the Member for Ashton-under-Lyne. I do not think that I can usefully add anything to that reply, except to say that I have no power over district Commissioners.

MR. RENWICK (Newcastle-on-Tyne): Is it not the fact that the Commissioner and surveyors have no legal power to demand a balance sheet?

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: I think that the hon. Member had better refer to the full and elaborate answer I previously gave entering into the whole of this question.

MR. RENWICK: Cannot the right hon. Gentleman give me an answer now? It is a very simple question.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: The Answer is that I have given the answer already. I cannot traverse the whole ground again.

MR. RENWICK: I believe that the Commissioners are acting illegally.

MR. MYER (Lambeth, N.): Is the right hon. Gentleman not aware that the Commissioners have no power to ask for a balance sheet?

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: I cannot accept the interpretation of the Act given by my hon. friend. I think that they have the power.

Administration of the Aliens Act.

MR. FELL (Great Yarmouth): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if four Russian Jews, who were recently refused permission to land at Hull because they were undesirable emigrants, and who were deported under the Aliens Act, returned in another ship that did not carry twenty emigrants, and were then allowed to land; and, if so, whether steps will be taken under the Act to prevent the relanding of aliens who were found to be undesirable a short while previously.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. GLADSTONE, Leeds, W.): It is the fact that recently four aliens, who had been refused leave to land at Hull, returned a few days later and landed from non-immigrant ships. The Aliens Act gives the immigration officers no power to prevent any alien passenger from landing from a non-immigrant ship. I regret to say that I have reason to believe that the landing of undesirable aliens from non-immigrant ships at Hull is carried on systematically; and the matter is engaging my attention.

Mr. FELL asked whether regulations could not be made which would prevent such an anomaly as a man described as an undesirable alien being refused one week and allowed to land the next.

Mr. GLADSTONE: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will put that Question down.

Mr. LUPTON (Lincolnshire, Sleaford) asked when the right hon. Gentleman proposed to bring in a Bill to repeal the Aliens Act.

The Licensing Demonstration in Hyde Park.

Mr. BOTTOMLEY (Hackney, S.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has received any Report from the Chief Commissioner of Police with respect to the demonstration in Hyde Park on Sunday, 27th September; and whether he will communicate the nature of that Report to the House.

Mr. GLADSTONE: I have not received any such Report.

Mr. BOTTOMLEY: Has the right hon. Gentleman any evidence in his Department justifying the recent declaration of the Secretary of State for the Colonies that the demonstration consisted of imported inebriates?

Mr. GLADSTONE: I am not aware that any such declaration was made. ["Oh."] I repeat I am not aware of any such declaration. I have answered the Question on the Paper.

Mr. BOTTOMLEY: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will state the number of arrests for drunkenness in the Metropolitan area on Sunday, 27th September, and Sunday, 20th September, respectively.

Mr. GLADSTONE: The number of arrests for drunkenness in the Metropolitan Police District was as follows: On Sunday, 20th September, 144; on Sunday, 27th September, 165.

Overcrowding on the Metropolitan Railway.

Mr. WARDLE (Stockport): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether his attention has been drawn to the difficulties which passengers on the Metropolitan Railway whose journey necessitates changing at Baker Street Station between the hours of 8.30 a.m. and 9 a.m. have to experience in getting from one train to another; whether he is aware that the crowds of passengers have to pass through a narrow iron gate, which results in a scramble; whether he is aware that the trains at this time of the day provided to carry passengers to the City are few in number and of insufficient length, thereby causing overcrowding and inconvenience; and whether, in view of these facts, he proposes to take any, and, if so, what action.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Mr. CHURCHILL, Dundee): I have communicated with the railway company in the matter to which my hon. friend calls attention, and have received a reply of which I am forwarding him a copy.

Mr. REES: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that people who travel by this route are astonished that the volume of traffic is so well handled in so exceedingly confined a space?

Mr. CHURCHILL: I will send the hon. Member also a copy of the Company's reply, which will give him an answer to his Question.

Sewage Disposal.

Mr. CLOUGH (Yorkshire, W.R., Skipton): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether any further reports will be issued by the Royal Commission on the Treatment and Disposal of Sewage; and, if so, how many, and when does he expect to receive the final Report; and whether he proposes to introduce legislation for the regulation of trade effluents into public sewers before he receives the final Report of this Commission.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. JOHN BURNS, Battersea): I understand that the Royal Commission propose to issue a Report in the course of the next three months on the disposal of distillery refuse, and that in their final Report they will deal with the disposal of other trade effluents when not mixed with sewage. The date of the issue of the final Report cannot at present be given, but I do not think it will be necessary to await it before proposing legislation on the subject referred to in the Question.

Deaths from Starvation in London.

MR. SUMMERBELL: I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board if he will state the number of cases in the coroners' returns of starvation cases, respectively, connected with Shoreditch, Holborn, and the whole of London; whether he has taken any, and, if so, what steps to reduce the numbers in future; and whether he will suggest to the guardians of those unions that they should make it known to the poor that they are willing to give necessary relief, and especially medical relief, to the poor who need it, in accordance with 43 Eliz., c. 2, s. 1, and 4 & 5 Will. IV., c. 76, so that the poor may apply before they become totally destitute.

MR. JOHN BURNS: The latest return of the number of deaths upon which a coroner's jury returned a verdict of starvation or death, accelerated by privation, shows that in the year 1907 there were forty-six such cases in the whole of London, of which eight were connected with Shoreditch and seven with Holborn. There appears to be no reason to suppose that the poor are unaware of the facilities for obtaining medical or other relief. In many of the cases mentioned in the return relief was applied for and given, but the application was made at too late a stage. I will give consideration to the matter, but it is difficult to see what effective action can be taken in respect of persons who are unwilling to apply for relief, and whose cases are in no way brought under the notice of the guardians or their officers.

Civil Service Socialist Society.

MR. STAVELEY-HILL (Staffordshire, Kingswinford): I beg to ask the Postmaster-General whether his attention has been called to a meeting of the Civil Service Socialist Society to be held on 20th October, to be presided over by Mr. S. F. Green, the prospective Socialist Parliamentary candidate for South Bristol, and to be addressed by Mr. H. M. Hyndman on the coming social revolution; whether the action of this political society has his approval; and whether he will allow the formation of other societies among Post Office servants having for their object the advancement of anti-Socialist principles.

THE POSTMASTER-GENERAL (Mr. SYDNEY BUXTON, Tower Hamlets, Poplar): The hon. Member's Question has called my attention to the meeting to which he refers. Were the society an organisation within the Post Office, I should consider that its action in apparently inviting the public to attend the meeting constituted a breach of the Regulations. As, however, I understand the society is open to the whole Civil Service, and draws its Members from various Departments, I am communicating with the Treasury on the subject. As regards the last part of the Question there already exists among Post Office servants a society having among its specific objects the advancement of anti-Socialistic principles, and I have more than once stated I have no objection to the formation of other societies within the Post Office provided they observe the conditions laid down as regards the character of their activities.

The National Telephone Company.

MR. LEVERTON HARRIS (Tower Hamlets, Stepney): I beg to ask the Postmaster-General whether any employment has yet been found in the Post Office service for men recently discharged by the National Telephone Company, owing to the stoppage of construction work due to the Government taking over the business of the Company; and what provision he proposes to make for finding work for men who are discharged in districts where there is no Post Office telephone system.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON: As I stated yesterday, such discharges by the National Telephone Company as have recently taken place where they were not due to misconduct or incompetence, or to the termination of temporary employment or employment for certain special purposes, have been mainly caused by an exceptional falling off in orders obtained from the public consequent on the recent depression of business throughout the United Kingdom, and not by such a stoppage of the general construction work as is suggested in the Question. Employment has been found in the Post Office during the last six months for more than 100 of the men discharged, and I am anxious to do what I can in that direction; but the existing openings at my disposal are, of course, limited. As I have already stated, I desire to come to an arrangement with the Company whereby the general construction work of the telephone system can be steadily continued in the best way until the Company's undertaking is taken over by the Post Office.

*MR. JAMES HOPE (Sheffield, Central): Is not the right hon. Gentleman convinced by his own experience of the inexpediency of any attempt on the part of the State to resume the monopoly of traffic over which it has lost immediate control?

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON: On the contrary.

MR. LUPTON: Is not the present an opportune time for new construction inasmuch as work can be done at moderate rates? Is it not the fact also that agricultural districts would benefit largely by an extension of the telephone system?

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON: That is too large a subject to be dealt with in an answer to a Question across the floor of the House. I should be glad, however, to discuss it on a suitable occasion.

Hyde Park Roads.

CAPTAIN FABER: I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether, looking at the state of unemployment now existing, he can recommend that the roadway from Princes Gate over the Serpentine to Bayswater Road be doubled so as to avoid the inconvenience for residents in Kensington having to go round by Park Lane to Paddington when the existing road across the park is shut.

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (Mr. L. HARCOURT, Lancashire, Rossendale): I regret that I am unable to adopt the suggestion of the hon. Member. The existing road is a very wide one, and to double it would be to create an eyesore. It is only closed once a year, and then at the time of year least calculated to cause inconvenience.

CAPTAIN FABER: Will the right hon. Gentleman bear the suggestion in mind?

MR. L. HARCOURT: Certainly.

Civil Servants and Territorial Camps.

MR. BRODIE (Surrey, Reigate): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether any circular has been issued by the Treasury to say that if additional leave is given to Government employees who are in the Territorial Army they must refund their Army pay to the Government, and that if they want additional leave they may be called on to provide a substitute and also refund their Army pay; and whether such, or a similar, circular was issued after camp was over this year, leaving no choice to the men.

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. HOBHOUSE, Bristol, E.): Circulars were issued on 30th March and 6th June last before the annual camps were held pointing out to Civil Servants that if they choose to spend their ordinary leave in camp they may draw both civil and military pay during the camp period; if they take special leave for the purpose, and no substitute is required to perform their work in their absence, a deduction will be made from their civil pay equivalent to the amount of their military pay, excluding allowances. The cost of a substitute when required falls on the civil servant whose duties he performs, and the latter is in this case allowed to retain both civil and military pay from which to meet the charge, but any excess over the total amount of the military and civil pay is borne by the State.

The Lews.

MR. YOUNGER (Ayr Burghs): I beg to ask the Secretary for Scotland whether any change has yet taken place in the financial situation in the Lews; whether the local administration remains in a position of bankruptcy owing to non-payment of the greater part of the rates; and what he proposes doing to prevent the complete breakdown of that administration.

THE SECRETARY FOR SCOTLAND (Mr. SINCLAIR, Forfarshire): I have no reason to believe that any change has taken place in the financial situation in the Lews. The Local Government Board are in communication with the parish councils, and any representations will be considered as soon as they are received.

MR YOUNGER: If the rates continue unpaid how is it proposed to carry on the local administration?

MR. SINCLAIR: My Answer covers that Question.

The Royal Irish Constabulary.

MR. FETHERSTONHAUGH (Fermanagh, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether any steps are to be taken during the present session to improve the pay and position of the Royal Irish Constabulary.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. BIRRELL, Bristol, N.): I am anxious to proceed with the Constabulary (Ireland) Bill as soon as possible, and will take advantage of the first opportunity that may arise. The hon.

and learned Member is probably aware that the financial Resolution, which is a necessary preliminary to the introduction of the Bill, is at present before the House, and that the Committee on the subject has been deferred until Monday next.

MR. MOORE (Armagh, N.): Will the Bill include provision for the improvement of the position of the officers as well as of the men?

MR. BIRRELL: I would sooner not answer that Question, as it would involve entering into particulars.

Loughgeorge Outrage.

CAPTAIN CRAIG (Down, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that on Wednesday, 30th September last, an attack was made on the residence of a widow, named Mrs. Greathead, situate at Loughgeorge, about eight miles from Galway Town, shots being fired through the windows; whether he can state if the direction of the shots indicated an intention to do bodily harm or merely to intimidate; whether he is aware that Mrs. Greathead has been persecuted for a long time because she will not give up the farm which is her only support; how many arrests, if any, have been made; and what sentences, if any, have been passed on the perpetrators of the outrage.

MR. BIRRELL: At eight o'clock on the evening of 30th September several gun-shots were fired through the windows of two rooms in Mrs. Greathead's house, one room being on the ground floor, and one on the first floor. The rooms were lighted up and the windows were unshuttered. Two members of the family were in each room but no one was hit. Many flattened grains of shot were found inside the windows. An empty cartridge case was found at forty yards distance from the house, and several gun-wads were found between that spot and the house. The shots therefore do not appear to have been fired at short range. It is the fact that Mrs. Greathead has been subjected to annoyance because she declines to give up a portion of her farm. All necessary protection is being afforded to her. The police have not yet succeeded in obtaining sufficient evidence to justify any arrests in the case.

Rinneen Outrage.

CAPTAIN CRAIG: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether any arrests have been made in connection with the attack made on Michael Casey, a farmer living at Rinneen, near Ruan, about seven miles from Ennis, county Clare, in August last, when he was twice shot in the back of the head; whether he is aware that twenty-eight pellets were found in his head, shoulders, and back; whether it is the second time he has been the victim of firing outrages; what sentences have been passed in the case; to what reasons the police authorities attribute the outrages, and what steps they have taken to afford him protection in the future; and has Michael Casey quite recovered.

MR. BIRRELL: Michael Casey was fired at and injured in the manner described in the Question on 11th September last. He was also fired at on 14th July, 1907, but was not hit. No arrests have been made. As the offender has not been traced, I am unable to state the motive for the offence. The police are affording full protection to Casey, who has quite recovered from his injury.

Firearms in Ireland.

CAPTAIN CRAIG: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether any arrests have been made in connection with the attack made on three labouring men in the employment of Miss Godley, Kilrar, near Farrigallen, by Carrick-on-Shannon, in August last, when they were fired at when engaged in reaping oats, and one of their number, John Clay, was wounded by a bullet piercing his thigh; what sentences have been passed in the case; to what reasons the police authorities attribute the outrage, what steps they have taken to afford these men adequate protection in the future; and has John Clay quite recovered.

MR. BIRRELL: On 9th September last John Clay and two other labourers were reaping for Miss Godley when a shot was fired in an adjoining wood and Clay was injured in the leg. No arrests have been made. The police are not aware of any possible motive for firing at Clay, as both he and his employer are popular in the locality. In the opinion of the police authorities there is no necessity for affording protection to the men. Clay is progressing favourably, but has not yet quite recovered.

EARL WINTERTON (Sussex, Horsham): What steps have been taken to discover who carry firearms in this district?

MR. BIRRELL: I do not know that any special steps have been taken.

MR. MOORE (Antrim, N.): Is it not the fact that since the Act has been repealed in twelve months outrages from firearms have increased by more than a third?

MR. BIRRELL: It is the fact.

CAPTAIN CRAIG: We warned the right hon. Gentleman.

MR. MOORE asked whether the increase was not directly due to the action of the Government in repealing the Arms Act.

MR. BIRRELL: No, Sir. During the most disturbed times in Ireland firearms were to be had and outrages were more frequent than now.

Ministerial Salaries.

MR. STANLEY WILSON (Yorkshire, E.R., Holderness): I beg to ask the Prime Minister if it is proposed during the autumn session to introduce a Bill dealing with the revision of Ministerial salaries.

THE PRIME MINISTER AND FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. Asquith, Fife, E.): The Answer is in the negative.

MR. ARTHUR LEE (Hampshire, Fareham): Has the proposal to revise these salaries been abandoned?

[No reply was audible.]

The Government and Home Rule.

VISCOUNT CASTLEREAGH: I beg to ask the Prime Minister whether he will state the nature of the pledges that he has given to make Home Rule one of the living issues at the next general election, and whether he will give the House an opportunity of discussing his proposals.

MR. ASQUITH: The pledges which I have given on the subject on behalf of the Government are to be found in the debate this session on the Motion of the hon. Member for Waterford, and in answer to some later Questions. The whole matter was then fully discussed, and I see no reason for reopening it at this moment.

*VISCOUNT CASTLEREAGH asked whether the statement of Mr. Redmond at the Boston Conference that the right hon. Gentleman had given both public and private pledges that Home Rule would be one of the living issues at the next general election was correct.

MR. ASQUITH: I have given no private pledges. My pledges have been public, and are to be found recorded in Hansard.

Bakers and the Eight Hours Bill.

MR. W. THORNE (West Ham, S.): I beg to ask the Prime Minister whether he can see his way to give facilities for the passing of the Eight Hours Bill for bakers, in consequence of so many of them working eighty, ninety, and in some cases 100 hours per week.

MR. ASQUITH: I am afraid that this is not a Bill which comes under the category of strictly non-controversial measures, and I cannot therefore hold out hopes that the Government will be able to afford facilities.

MR. REES: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the bakers protest against this suggested interference, and that at least one hon. Member has been strictly informed by his constituency to block this Bill on all occasions?

MR. ASQUITH: I am afraid this is not a Bill for which the Government can hold out any hopes.

Licensing Bill—Time Limit.

MR. ELLIS (Nottinghamshire, Rushcliffe): I wish to ask the Prime Minister the Question—of which I have given him private notice—whether he is prepared to put the House in possession of the terms of the Amendment by which it is proposed to carry out the suggestion that for a short term of years succeeding the fourteen years the surrender of the monopoly value shall not be necessarily a condition of the renewal of an old licence.

MR. ASQUITH: Without pledging myself in this stage to any precise form of words the suggestion which I made would, I think, be given effect to by adding the following proviso to subsection 1, Clause 3: "Provided that until the expiration of seven years after the termination of the reduction period there shall be no power to attach as a condition to the regrant of an old licence any condition for securing to the public the monopoly value of the licence." A definition of "old licence" will have to be inserted defining the term to mean, as regards on-licences, existing licences within the meaning of the Act of 1904, i.e., licences existing before the passing of that Act, and as respects off-licences, licences existing before the passing of the Bill.

POST OFFICE SITES BILL.

Mr. Sydney Buxton, Mr. Crossley, and Mr. William Nicholson nominated Members of the Select Committee on the Post Office Sites Bill.—(Mr. Joseph Pease.)

SELECTION (STANDING COMMITTEES).

Sir WILLIAM BRAMPTON GURDON reported from the Committee of Selection; That they had discharged the following Member from Standing Committee B. (in respect of the Housing, Town Planning, etc., Bill): Mr. Munro Ferguson; and had appointed in substitution (in respect of the said Bill): Mr. Charles Corbett.

Report to lie upon the Table.

LICENSING BILL.

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 3:

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (Mr. L. HARCOURT, Lancashire, Rossendale) was about to propose the Amendment standing in his name, when—

MR. A. J. BALFOUR (City of London) said the Prime Minister had just told them the terms in which the Amendment which he foreshadowed would be ultimately couched. Could he not move it in this place?

MR. LEIF JONES (Westmoreland, Appleby) asked if they had not by the closure Resolution finished subsection (1) of Clause 3.

*THE CHAIRMAN said that if the Amendment was a part of subsection (1) it was clear that they could not deal with it now.

MR. JAMES HOPE (Sheffield, Central) said that if the Resolution on the Paper was carried subsection (2) disappeared; would it not then be possible to move a new subsection (2) other than what was on the Paper?

MR. WALTER LONG (Dublin, S.) said the Motion on the Paper was to omit the existing subsection and substitute a new one. Was it not open to the Government to retain the Motion for the omission, and substitute for the new subsection the Amendment which the Prime Minister had read to them?

THE PRIME MINISTER AND FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. ASQUITH, Fifehire, E.) said he would be very glad indeed to do that, but it was impossible, because his Amendment was a proviso to subsection (1), and could not be introduced as a new subsection.

MR. L. HARCOURT said he would explain the object of the Amendment on the Paper. It was put down to fulfil a promise made by the Prime Minister a few days ago that he would make two things which were the intention of the Government abundantly clear; first of all, that the local option provided under Clause 2 should continue under the extended circumstances after the reduction period of fourteen years had terminated, that it should extend to new and to old on-licences after the period of fourteen years, and also that where the local option was exercised after that period and under somewhat different circumstances a two-thirds majority of those voting would be necessary for the carrying of that Resolution. He was aware from the Notice Paper that there was some difference of opinion as to the particular fraction which should be adopted for such a majority, but the proposal of the Government showed that on this occasion at all events they had chosen the golden mean. He might be told by some of his hon. friends that three-fifths was a common figure in use in the United States of America and in many of our Colonies; he might even be told that where two-thirds was in use—he believed it was in Queensland—it had never been operative; but he would also ask whether three-fifths would be operative either; he thought it would probably be discovered that it would not. They had thought that it was reasonable that where what a certain number of people regarded as an inconvenience was to be inflicted on the locality it should be done by a sensible and a considerable majority of those who had taken the trouble to express their opinion on the subject. As to the reason for the selection of two-thirds instead of three-fifths, it was always difficult to explain why one fraction should be chosen rather than another, and perhaps it would be as good a reason as another to say that we were at present a duo-decimal rather than a decimal nation and that our people were more accustomed to think in thirds than in fifths; but he would point out to those who disapproved of the two-thirds majority that it was the provision that was maintained in the Liquor Traffic (Local Control) Bill of 1895, and a proposal which was at that time frankly accepted. The two-thirds majority had even appeared in some of the permissive Bill.

which were introduced into the House by the late Sir Wilfrid Lawson, although not in all of them. Therefore he could not believe that that figure was one which would be objected to by any large number of those who were concerned in the discussion of this question. He thought that for the sake of temperance itself they should aim at securing a large majority. As to subsection (b), it had been slightly enlarged or amplified in form from that in which it originally appeared on the Paper. It had been done in order to show that they anticipated in the future that power would be given by this House to localities not only to limit but to reduce the number of licences then in existence. The whole of subsection (b) was suggestive, and it was quite impossible to bind them either to a minimum or to a maximum. They had thought it right here to suggest what seemed to them two obvious and necessary developments of this policy at a future date, but it did not exclude other developments which might be added by Parliament fourteen years hence. His own opinion was that by that time the public view on this matter would have so developed, owing possibly to the success of this Bill in operation, that that public opinion would then carry with it its own amplification. As to subsection (c), that had been put down in order to make it clear that a resolution for the prohibition of the issue of new licences during the period of reduction, if it happened to be in operation at the close of that period of reduction, should not be taken then to mean a total prohibition of all the licences in existence. That would be an obvious injustice, because the vote would not have been taken on that question when it was carried, and it would have been carried, too, by a simple majority; but at the same time it was provided that if such a resolution had been put into effect less than three years before the termination of the reduction period, that Resolution should come to an end then and should not prevent the locality from taking a fresh vote under the different circumstances immediately the reduction period had come to a close. He hoped that these provisions had met the promises which were made by the Prime Minister, and that this elucidation of the policy proposed would meet with a more or less general acceptance from the Committee.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 3, line 18, to leave out subsection (2), and to insert '(2) On the termination of the reduction period: (a) The foregoing provisions of this Act as to local option shall take effect as if a majority of two-thirds of the votes given were required for the carrying of a resolution instead of a bare majority; and (b) those provisions shall be extended in such manner as Parliament may determine so as to authorise a resolution limiting the number of licences to the number existing at the time, or reducing that number to any less number; and (c) a prohibitory resolution in force at the date of the termination of the reduction period shall cease to have effect, but the provision of this Act as to the interval required between the taking of polls shall not prevent a poll being taken on a further resolution, although three years have not elapsed since the date of the poll on the resolution which has so ceased to take effect.'"—(Mr. L. Harcourt.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out to the word 'after' in line 18, stand part of the clause."

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said he did not propose at that moment to say anything upon the general principle of local option, to which he was unalterably opposed, but he had other observations to make which must be made in order that they might enter on the wider discussion with a freer hand and a more intimate knowledge as to what were the real intentions of the Government. The right hon. Gentleman began his statement by saying that the proposal with regard to a two-thirds majority had always been the intention of the Government, and that his Motion was intended to make that intention perfectly clear. It was a very extraordinary statement to make. They were quite prepared to give the Government a large licence in changing their minds, but it was too great a strain for their credulity to believe that the Government were quite clear that they always wanted this subject determined by a two-thirds majority, and that they happened to forget to give that information to the draughtsman. The truth was that they had found their own plan would not work, and they now found it necessary to alter fundamentally, or at any rate in a very important particular, their original proposals. That was not the only point in this subsection on which the Government had entirely altered their original views. He must remind the Committee that this subsection gave local veto not merely in the question of on-licences but in the question of off-licences.

MR. L. HARCOURT: No.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Certainly. Will the right hon. Gentleman tell me quite clearly whether this applies to off-licences or not?

MR. L. HARCOURT said he was sorry he did not have an opportunity of explaining on Friday the intention of the words added to the Bill. Nobody regretted the absence of the possibility of explanation more than the Minister himself. If he had had that opportunity he would have explained what was the intention of the Government, and what had been the result of the Government's Amendment. The intention of that Amendment was merely to provide that the monopoly value, if any, of old off-licences after the reduction period should be secured. Under Clause 5 of the Bill the monopoly value of all new licences was taken, including off-licences. In taking the monopoly value in future of off-licences they were not taking any property which they had now got—nothing in the nature of an equitable expectation or a sacred right. It was clear that that view was held by the late Government, because in their Bill of 1904 they left the discretion of the justices as regards off-licences what it had always been. He believed it was universally admitted that off-licences had no monopoly value now, but it had perhaps only recently been realised that when this Bill became an Act, under the operation of Clauses 1, 2, and 3, it was quite possible that after the expiration of fourteen years they might create some monopoly value for off-licences which they did not now possess and to which they were not entitled. They had all suffered from the growth of accidental claims of that sort, and they thought it was desirable to take steps now to prevent such growth after the reduction period. Therefore the intention of the words was merely to secure that if any monopoly value between now and then for off-licences came into operation it should be secured to the State, and that notice to that effect should be given now to the holders of off-licences so that no such expectation could arise. That was the intention, and he hoped the effect, of the Amendment.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said the right hon. Gentleman had absolutely mistaken the point of his observations. He thought the question of monopoly value was irrelevant to this subsection, and the right hon. Gentleman was mistaken in supposing that he was clearing up a difficulty in regard to the monopoly value of off-licences, with which he was not attempting to deal. This point was of a different kind. As he read the language of subsection (1) of Clause 3, the Government extended to off-licences all the provisions applicable to the grant of new licences. One of those provisions was that after a certain period there should be local veto upon them, from which it seemed to him that the inference was absolutely clear that local veto was applicable to off-licences, or would be applicable to them after the reduction period. He was himself quite incapable of reading the words in any other sense, and unless the Government were prepared to get up now and contradict him on that point—

MR. L. HARCOURT: That was not and is not the intention of the Government, and I hope it is not the effect of the Amendment. If it is the effect of the Amendment which has been inserted it shall be altered on Report.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said the right hon. Gentleman seemed to think he had put a strained and paradoxical interpretation on the language of the Bill as amended. Might he interject the remark that the Opposition had never interfered with the Government in the framing of their Amendment; they were never allowed the opportunity of discussing it. The Government and their draftsmen had been given ample time for considering how to draft their Amendment, being protected from inconvenient criticism after they had drafted it. They then came to the House of Commons and told them two things. In the first place, they said, it carried out the original intention of the Government, though quite obviously it should not. Secondly, the meaning of the Amendment, as far as he could see from its words, and which every single Gentleman with whom he had talked had always held that they carried with them, was that local veto was to be applied to off-licences as well as to on-licences, which he should have thought the Government, in strict logic, would have thought to be the proper course. When he was told that this interpretation of their words burst upon the Government with surprise, that they had never agreed to that policy, and that they were going to correct it on Report, he was really filled with amazement. He was always aware, partly from his own painful experience and partly from his observation of the painful experience of other people, that when there was a small interval given between the arduous work of Parliamentary sessions the Government did not do its work as well as it would have been done if a longer time had been at their disposal. He was bound to say that never was there clearer proof that the Government was utterly overworked and incapable of considering the words of the Bill which they were driving through the House than that which was presented to them that day by the right hon. Gentleman in charge of the Amendment. In the plain meaning of the words, as interpreted by the right hon. Gentleman's own friends, by hon. Gentlemen opposite as well as by the Opposition, the principle of local veto was to be extended not merely to on-licences, but to off-licences. So clear was the Prime Minister that there could be no mistake as to the effect of the Amendment, that when he suggested that a little more time should be given to the House for discussion, the right hon. Gentleman told them that they had not voted against it, that, therefore, it was clear they had all agreed to it, and that at all events they were precluded from asking the Government to grant an opportunity for discussion. Yet the very first five minutes of this discussion had been the means of pretation of their own policy which no human being who read their Amendment had ever thought it was capable of. However, the right hon. Gentleman now told them that the plain intention of the Government, as it had always been, was that there should be a two-thirds majority after the period of reduction, that off-licences should not be included in the local veto scheme, and that he meant to put down an Amendment making that patent and effective on the Report stage. He would only be wasting time if he were to discuss the very important and interesting question which would be raised if the Government's clause really carried out the Government's policy. But as it did not carry out the Government's policy, and as they were going to re-think their new thoughts, he withheld until the Report stage any criticism upon that subject. Without trespassing upon the broad issue raised by the principle of local veto, he would ask the right hon. Gentleman a question with regard to subsection (b) of the proposed new clause—

Had the right hon. Gentleman, or those under whose advice he acted, any precedent for a subsection which contained terms so amazing as those which he had placed upon the Paper? The terms were mandatory to the Parliament of fourteen years hence to carry out the object which this Government wanted carried out, but the machinery for the carrying out of which they were too idle to devise. Parliament fourteen years hence “shall do something”; it might choose its own method of doing it, but this Parliament said it “shall be done.” This Parliament ordered them to do it, and they were to find the means of doing it. Was there any precedent in any Act of Parliament for this kind of direction? Some future Parliament was to deal with this very complicated and difficult question which they, who were the authors of this mandatory provision, had not themselves thought of doing. [AN HON. MEMBER: The Water Board.] It was a private Bill to which the hon. Gentleman referred, but he could not imagine their dealing with a great question of public policy by such means as were provided by subsection (b), in which the policy was laid down, while the mode of carrying it out was not prescribed. He did not know how many general elections there might be between the present moment and the fateful period when the fourteen years elapsed. [Cries of "Two" and "Three."] There were to be two general elections according to the prophetic instinct of the Solicitor-General, and the second Parliament elected was ordered by the right hon. Gentleman and his friends to carry out their present object, and to devote its best abilities to find out the means. The future Parliament would be allowed to settle its own methods, but not its own policy. He really thought that this subsection was one of those illusory pretences or illusory contributions to the temperance literature which carried with it no effect, which might have some effect on the consciences of hon. Gentlemen who were deeply interested in this particular form of dealing with the problem, but which ought not to be allowed to appear with the authority of the responsible Government upon the Statute-book of the country. They had no right whatever to tell some future Parliament that it was to do something whether it liked it or not, and that it was hoped they would find a convenient and expedient method of doing it. Subsection (b) certainly ought to be excised, and he would only say, in this part of the debate, that even in the short discussion which they had had, it was perfectly clear that the Government had never known their own minds, and they had not been able, with all the advantages they had, to draft their Bill so as to carry out what they now said was their original intention; and when they put a new Amendment on the Paper it appeared to carry with it effects which, however pleasing to hon. Gentlemen behind them, never were part, they were given to understand, of the original scheme of the Government. If the objection to local veto and local prohibition could be strengthened by the mode in which the Government tried to put it into force, then it would certainly be greatly strengthened by this extraordinary proceeding, a proceeding which would have been amazing in any circumstances, and which was little short of a Parliamentary scandal from the way in which it was carried out under the regulations for discussion.

*MR. WHITEHEAD (Essex, S.E.) said he wanted to make an appeal to the right hon. Gentleman not to press this Amendment, but either to withdraw the clause or go back to the former clause as embodied in the Bill and as fully considered by the Government themselves. That clause involved leaving in the hands of future Parliaments the duty of working out all the details of a very complicated question. There were two or three considerations which made the former clause more expedient and more worthy the acceptance of the House. In the first place, there was no adequate time for the discussion of this very important question. The time-table under which they were acting was fixed under very different conditions from those now existing, because the Government Amendment opened up a new discussion. Secondly, there was no need to legislate hurriedly to-day on an issue which concerned only the future after the lapse of fourteen years. But another reason which weighed with him with equal if not greater force was that he regarded the Amendment of the Government as an absolute stab in the back for the future of temperance reform. He believed that local veto, saddled with the two conditions of absolute local prohibition and of a two-thirds majority, would be fatal to any future ratepayers exercising the popular veto. That was a very grave consideration, and those of them who were ardent supporters of the Bill, and who were anxious to see not only a diminution of licences in the next few years, but a steady and continuous reduction in the years to come afterwards, could not help regarding such a clause as that now proposed as one seriously affecting the interests of temperance reform. There was one assumption underlying the clause which affected the whole principle of local option and local veto, namely, that it was a purely local question. It never was a purely local question. If they went back to the remotest times of licensing

there was always a wayfarer or traveller—a man whose business called him from home and who might legitimately expect to have facilities for refreshment in whatever part of the country to which his business might call him. If that was true a hundred years ago, or fifty years ago, it was increasingly true to-day. The whole conditions of modern life were such that the work which men had to do lay far from their homes; and as facilities for locomotion increased, licensing became less and less a purely local question. It was very largely a local question, but not a purely local question, any more than the use of our roads was a purely local question. Roads were maintained at the expense of the localities, but it would be an extraordinary proposition to say that therefore they were not to be free to the public at large. The conditions which rendered the licensing question less a purely local one were increasing in their effect day by day. To take a single illustration of the anomalies that would arise if they had regard solely to local considerations: in the City of London there was an electorate of about 30,000 people, and a population who came there during the day time of, perhaps, something like 1,000,000. He was quite aware that the City would not form a single licensing area under the Bill. But it would suffice to take it as a type and illustration. Yet, as he understood, if the doctrine of local option pure and simple were applied, this 30,000, or it might be a residuum representing so many thousand caretakers and charwomen, would decide absolutely whether a large body of men coming from all parts, and residing at Brighton, Sevenoaks or Southend, should carry on their business under conditions to which they were accustomed, and which were almost necessary to the performance of their work. Therefore, it was not a purely local question, but he felt very strongly indeed that the local view was of very great importance, and in any reform of the licensing system the local view ought to be given full effect to. But when he said the local view he did not mean merely the view of any majority or any minority. As he understood the Government Amendment, if they had 100 electors, and 65 of them were in favour of a prohibition of licences and 35 were against, the view of those 35 would be absolute and binding on the whole community. That was a reductio ad absurdum of the doctrine of popular control. He did not believe in these days that any minority or any majority either in a matter of this kind had any moral right to trample down the views of other people. He believed any sane system would allow due regard to be given to the views of all. Surely his hon. friends who were Nonconformists could not fail to remember how deep-seated had been the feeling throughout the community at the action taken by the Church of England Party with regard to the education question when they were the dominating power in that House. There was the grievance which the Nonconformists felt because their view, whilst they were in a minority, was unduly disregarded in the settlement of that question. In the same way fair treatment of minorities should be accorded in the settlement of the licensing question, as in the settlement of any other question which deeply stirred the interests, the opinions and habits of a large body of the people. He spoke as one most anxious for the carrying into effect of the Bill, and most anxious to support the Government in the immediate but also the future reduction of licences. If it was left in the Bill in the form in which it was proposed by this Amendment they would have a system which, so far as it went, was complete. That was to say they would have a system of local veto with merely two conditions attached to it. If Parliament hereafter added other conditions well and good, but they knew very well that Parliamentary time was constantly taken up by new questions arising, and as there would be no absolute necessity thrown upon the future Parliament to legislate on the matter it might well be that the conditions imposed in this Bill and by the Government Amendment would not merely become law for the next few years, but would remain law for a long period either because they were in the view of the dominant Party of the day sufficient for the purpose, or because there were other questions which Parliament thought more urgent, and felt called upon to deal with. In this matter where they were creating an instrument which was to carry out certain work they must consider the material of which that instrument was going to be made. The instrument in this case was made of the elector—the average man of the country. They must bear in mind who and what the average elector was. They would never get a majority of two-thirds unless they carried with them the moderate man, the man who was neither a publican nor a drunkard, nor one who believed that every form of alcohol was an injury to the system, and to the State. The moderate man had after all merely the instincts of an Englishman. He, as a rule, was not a deep political thinker, but the fundamental instinct, perhaps the guiding principle of English political life was the love of liberty, and that applied, not only to themselves, in so far as they disliked to be interfered with and liked to lead their lives according to their own views, but it affected also the attitude they took towards public questions. Especially did it affect those who belonged to the Liberal Party and believed this love of freedom was peculiarly in their own charge. He believed the average elector, if the issue were put to him: Shall I vote in favour of depriving my neighbour of all right to that form of refreshment which he is accustomed to, and thinks necessary for his system—would say: “No, I have no moral right to deprive him of it absolutely,” and the result would be that local option would not in effect have any operation on an extensive scale. That being so, any system of local veto must be one which came into force gradually, and allowed for a reasonable reduction in accordance with the views of the locality. He hoped the Government would see their way to accept at a later stage some Amendments he had on the Paper to effect that purpose. He desired to see a gradual and steady reduction of licences not only to-day but also in years to come, and he wished to have fair consideration of the needs of the travelling public, and those who carried on their life's work away from their homes. He desired to see reasonable treatment of the minority as well as the majority, and he believed he was speaking in the true interests of the Bill and of temperance reform when he asked the Government not to insist upon imposing these two terms only in formulating a scheme of local option, but to leave the whole matter to be carefully sifted at some future date by a Parliament which would have time to deal with the whole question. He made this appeal to the Government of which he was a faithful supporter, in no spirit of hostility to the Bill or to giving effect to local wishes, but with a sincere desire to see the work to which the Government had put their hand carried to a successful conclusion, and that it might really prove beneficial to the State.

EARL WINTERTON (Sussex, Horsham) said he quite agreed with a good deal of what the hon. Gentleman had said. It would be quite impossible to make local veto or prohibition as contained in this clause anything but unjust and hard upon a large number of people. The Government might have failed to express their intentions, but at any rate, they had succeeded in introducing into their Bill the whole principle of prohibition. Whether or not grocers' licences were included, was a small matter compared with the question as to whether prohibition, as it was known in America and the Colonies, should be introduced into this country. What they had to deal with was prohibition pure and simple. That was the proposal which he was prepared to discuss on general lines. Although several opportunities had been given to the Government, they had not given the House one word of justification for the introduction of prohibition into this country. In every country where prohibition had been enforced, it had proved a total failure. It would be impossible without detaining the Committee at great length to go into the whole question of prohibition, and he would only endeavour to show that where it had been tried it had been such a dismal failure that the majority of people were anxious to go back to the previous state of things. He quoted an extract from an article by the hon. Member for the Woodstock division in the Nineteenth Century, which, he said, only bore out the view of every impartial person, whether Liberal or Conservative, who had been in a prohibition area. He had been in New Brunswick where the Scott Act, passed twenty years ago, was in operation in certain areas, and he was assured by many people, Liberals and Conservatives, holding many different positions in life, that where the Act had been put in operation, though the saloons and the liquor traffic had been injured, and there was less open drinking, there was twice as much secret drinking as there had been before, and so far from inducing temperance it had led to the worst form of intemperance, namely, intoxication from drinking badly-distilled liquor which had never been sold in a properly conducted bar. That had been the effect all over the country. There was hardly a single State in which prohibition was enforced in which there was not some form of selling drink. They had not heard in that debate a single word in justification of the American system. The Prime Minister had told them how the system had worked in other countries, yet he came down to the House with a very badly drafted Amendment of which he could not explain the provisions and expected them to adopt the whole principle of prohibition and local option. It might be urged that they were not likely to have such violation of the law in this country, and so much corruption as had taken place in the United States and in other countries, but he did not see that there was any reason to suppose that that would not happen. They said it was an ill bird that fouled its own nest, but he would be sorry to say that the average man in Maine or New Brunswick was more corrupt than the average voter in this country. What had caused the law to be violated and corruption so prevalent was not the corruption of individual men but the badness of the laws themselves. There was no purer Anglo-Saxon community than in the New England States and Southern Canada, and they were in other respects a most law abiding people, but they expected to carry out things which could never be carried out by laws. Apart from that there was in America, Canada, and Australia at all times far less drinking of alcoholic liquor than in this country, and it was quite a common thing to go into a man's house and find nothing but temperance drinks—tea, coffee, and water. At any rate the temperance advocates and Governments of that country had been consistent. He believed that in many instances in the prohibition States of America and in provinces in Canada where prohibition was in force no kind of alcoholic drink was admitted to the tables of members of the Government. That was quite true; there were two cases in America where at the Governor's State banquet nothing but temperance drinks was permitted. What he wished to ask right hon. Gentlemen opposite was: were they prepared to go to that length in this country and carry the principle of prohibition to its logical issue. The prohibition areas of the United States and Canada had made the experiment and they admitted that it had failed to make total abstinence universal throughout those areas. No such suggestion of a general prohibition was made in the Bill nor had it been advocated by its promoters. As it stood, the effect of the subsection under discussion would be simply to prevent the poor man obtaining his drink under proper conditions, whilst on the other hand the rich man might have as much as he liked. It was for that reason that he and his friends maintained that the proposal was an undemocratic one and essentially a scheme to set up one law for the poor and another for the rich. He challenged the right hon. Gentleman to bring forward any justification for the proposal contained in the clause. They had not been able to prove the success of prohibition in any part of the world; it would simply lead to great inconvenience and even to universal corruption and disregard of the law.

MR. BELLOC (Salford, S.) thought the Committee was by this time convinced that the proposals of the Government were substantive as well as limiting. This was not merely a limiting Amendment—not merely an Amendment limiting the conditions under which local option would take place. It laid down that local option should exist in a very drastic form. A majority without doubt of the voting Liberals of the country, and probably a majority of the population, certainly a free majority of the House, were in favour of the main principle underlying the Bill, that the State should resume control, and that within a comparatively short period, over the liquor traffic. But on to that had been tacked, and this was an example of it, a number of clauses which had nothing whatever to do with that main principle. They had to do with a totally different principle, the principle that fermented liquor was a bad thing for the individual or for the State and in some way to be legislated against. That point of view probably did not carry the majority if it were free, and it most certainly did not carry the majority of the English people. It did not even carry a majority of the drilled Liberal voters. He could not deny that he felt some surprise when he noticed in whose name the Amendment had been put down. Even those who had no very long political memory could remember 1895, and if there was one thing that it was the fixed resolution of the English people to have nothing whatever to do with, it was local option—not the politicians, not the local fairly well-to-do men who arranged elections, but the working people who voted. He could tell two constituencies in which the elections turned mainly on this matter, and one of them was Derby. He had spoken to a very full meeting of the licensed victuallers of his constituency. The House would appreciate what their point of view was likely to be. They treated him very courteously, but there was no enthusiasm. He had also spoken by request to a large and very representative meeting of the temperance people who thought fermented liquor to be a bad thing; he distinctly affirmed his position in the clearest manner, and though of course the meeting could not be unanimous, the Chairman and more than one of those present recognised that if they were to have a right to limit the number of licences by a democratic vote, at least they must also have a right to say whether there should be more or whether there should be any. If they were to have a public vote over small areas in which a two-thirds majority of ratepayers might say to the other third: "You shall not use your local club or public-house," it was a principle to which he was opposed. It was impossible for a man who desired to represent his constituency and voted freely to vote in favour of an Amendment which gave local option. The whole country was definitely against it.

*MR. F. E. SMITH (Liverpool, Walston) said, in reference to the question as to whether off-licences were or were not included in the Bill as it stood, taking into consideration the Amendment and the original draft, he would be interested to hear the opinion of the Solicitor-General, because he could not conceive that there was any doubt at all that, as the Bill was drafted, off-licences must clearly be included. Clause 2 stipulated that, in respect of new licences local option should apply, while Clause 3 provided that on-licences should be treated as new licences at the termination of the reduction period. That provision in Clause 3 with the Amendment of the First Commissioner of Works would apply of course to off-licences. Another point was that if the Government were going to alter what the Bill now said so that local option should apply to off-licences, on what principle were they going to do so? He was opposed to local option and to the interference with off-licences contemplated by the Bill, but if it was the idea of the Government that local option was the proper way to deal with the spread of alcohol, which they were satisfied was at the bottom of very much immorality, and if they were going to leave it to the democratic vote of a constituency, what difference did it make whether it was sold for consumption on or off the premises? If there was anything in the panacea at all, it must apply to both forms of sale, and should not be limited to off-licences alone. There was another point which he hoped the Solicitor-General would explain. On what principle was a distinction drawn between the majority required in regard to local option in the first fourteen years and the majority required afterwards? In the first fourteen years it was to be a bare majority, and afterwards a two-thirds majority. He could not conceive what was the distinction of principle before and after the period of fourteen years. Another point to which he thought more attention should be given at present was the extraordinary proposal that—

Of course, that was pure prohibition. It was utterly irrelevant to draw a distinction between a passage in the Report of a Commission which condemned prohibition, and to point out that in other passages local option was not condemned at all. As to the proposal in the subsection, what it came to was this. The Government dared not propose prohibition in the degree to which they contemplated it would be possible to make proposals at a later date in some future Parliament, and, therefore, they laid down an academic instruction to future Parliaments which probably would have the utmost contempt for their policy.

While he thought the methods of the Government were novel and inconvenient, he commended their prudence. The hon. Member for Salford said there was nothing in the election of 1895 which was more responsible for the discomfiture of the Liberal Government of that day than local option, and that statement was received with considerable dissent by hon. Gentlemen opposite. He had there an extract from the Westminster Gazette, a journal which, he thought, would be regarded as representative of Liberal principles. After the election of 1895, that journal applied itself to the melancholy duty of ascertaining from Liberal candidates to what they attributed the uncomfortable experiences they had at the poll. Of the successful ones, who were not particularly numerous, 54 found the Licensing Bill harmful, 14 found it innocuous, and 16 only stated that it was helpful. Out of 157 defeated candidates 134 found the Bill harmful, 16 said that it did no great harm, and 7 said it was helpful. Only 13 out of 231 found it acceptable to the electorate on the Liberal side. The Prime Minister in introducing the concession by which for seven years after the expiration of the reduction period the monopoly value was not to be exacted in the case of licences renewed seemed to indicate that that breathing space would be of considerable value to licensed victuallers. He understood that during those seven years the licensed victualler would be exposed to having his licence taken away under the effect of a local option resolution. He wished to know from the Solicitor-General whether he was right in that. What was the value of a concession of that kind if as the result of one of those popular votes the licence was liable to disappear? The licensed victualler's life would be one long convulsion as to whether or not his licence would be in existence when the next popular vote was taken. On Friday last the Westminster Gazette had a leading article stating that it would be a debt of honour which licensing justices and voters in a locality would be sure to recognise that during those seven years licences should not be interfered with. He would like to ask whether the Westminster Gazette represented the view of the Government on this point. Was it the view of the Government that during those seven years there would be an honourable understanding that licensed victuallers were not to be dispossessed? If that was the view of the Government, and of the hon. Member for Westmoreland and others who held strong views on the subject, it would considerably clear the air. Was it the view of the Government that during those seven years local option should not work to the prejudice of the security of licensed victuallers? It might not be convenient for the Government to tell the Committee at the moment. If the view expressed by the Westminster Gazette was the view of the Government what was the objection of the Government to accepting the Amendment? If it was the desire of the supporters of the Government that there should be an honourable obligation, why give the voters in a locality who might not share the honourable obligation of the Government, the opportunity of taking away the licence? Another point to which he wished to call attention was the arrangements made by the right hon. Gentleman for ascertaining the opinion of a locality. They were told in the form of an Amendment that was to be determined by three-fourths of the votes given. He should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he thought that was the best way of determining the sense of the locality on the point, or whether he thought he was in the least likely to get a really representative vote instead by taking the alternative method and insisting on a certain proportion of votes in a particular area. In regard to that point there was a useful analogy. When the Government brought in the Education Bill of 1906 it was suggested by the present Secretary for Ireland that it was the genuine desire of the Government to give certain special facilities to parents who were not satisfied with the normal instruction. Their opinion was to be ascertained by ballot. He himself and his friends on that side of the House suggested that only the votes of those actually voting should be counted, and the Government utterly declined to consider that proposal; they said a representative ballot could not be got in the way they proposed. Speech after speech was made by his hon. friends and by Irish Members pointing out that it would be an essentially inadequate ballot taken under those circumstances. The Government told them repeatedly that the proper way to get the opinion of the parents was to take, not the votes given, but the total number of voters qualified to give votes, and to take the majority of them. Surely they were entitled to know why a ballot which represented the sum of political wisdom when dealing with an Education Bill was totally inadequate when dealing with a Licensing Bill. An answer was not necessary, for everyone knew that under the Education Bill the desire was to make the facilities sham facilities, while the desire under this Bill was to make the will of the faddists effective. Therefore, the Government adopted the converse course in this case. The more he examined the provisions for local option in detail, the more he was struck by their inconsistency. The provisions were objectionable, and so far as the north of England was concerned, if the Government chose to go to the country on these local option proposals on the lines of the Bill, the statistician of the Westminster Gazette would have a more extensive field of inquiry than in 1895.

*MR. LEIF JONES (Westmoreland, Appleby) said the hon. and learned Gentleman had challenged an appeal to the north of England in regard to the local option proposals. He would find that the opinion of the electors had already been expressed. Those who represented the north of England in this House had more right to speak for the electors of the north of England than those who did not. If the hon. and learned Gentleman would consult their votes, he would see that a majority were in favour of local option in the form in which it was in the Government Bill. The debate that afternoon had resolved itself into a sort of Second Reading discussion on the principle of local option. He did not resent that, although personally he thought the time would have been better spent in discussing the method in which local option could be applied. If hon. Members would recall the Parliamentary history of this question, they would find that whenever in recent years there had been a majority of Liberals in the House there had been a majority in favour of local option legislation. The hon. Member for Hull, in one of those ejaculations with which he enlivened their proceedings, said on Friday that this was local veto in six hours. It was forty-four years since local veto was first presented to this House.

MR. LANE-FOX (Yorkshire, W.R., Barkston Ash): And it would be forty-four years more.

*MR. LEIF JONES: It was forty-four years since the late Sir Wilfrid Lawson first introduced his Permissive Bill, and the question had been as fully discussed in the country and the House as any question could be. [An Hon. MEMBER on the OPPOSITION Benches: In this Parliament?] Yes. It was perfectly well known at the general election that the result of returning the present Government to power would be the introduction of a local veto or local option measure. [Cries of "No" from the OPPOSITION Benches.] He held in his hand a manifesto put out by the National Trade Defence Association on the eve of the general election, and this was what that Association said to the licensed traders—

"No general election has ever meant so much to you as this. If you don't exert yourself now, you will have to face local veto. There is no sensationalism about this and no exaggeration."

Mr. F. E. Smith.

That was the expectation of the trade. The speeches of His Majesty's Ministers were open to Members to read. Every one of them was deeply pledged on this question. Soon after the general election he had the opportunity of taking the opinion of the House on the question, and on a division the House declared in favour of the principle of local option on Colonial lines, by a majority of 227. Therefore, it was rather late in the day to pretend that it was a surprise to the trade to find this proposal in the Government Bill. The pledges of the Government and their supporters and the vote of the House, both led them to expect that local option would be part of the Government scheme for dealing with the licensing problem when they framed their Bill. He was sorry that the Government had not taken the Colonial precedents in regard to the proportion required to put local veto into operation. A two-thirds majority had been chosen. It was quite true that that majority found a place in some private Bills and in the Bill which the late Sir William Harcourt introduced in 1895. But he ventured to say that it was too large a proportion of the electorate to require to endorse any proposal. If a two-thirds majority were required in a Parliamentary election, right hon. and hon. Gentlemen opposite would not now be sitting there. Very few Members on the Government Bench received a two-thirds majority at the general election. Very few Members of the House received a two-thirds majority. He himself was elected by a bare majority, and there were many other Members who were in the same case, while some Members even represented a minority of the electors in their constituencies. If a majority vote was counted sufficient to change the Government of this country and Empire and to place in power a set of men holding entirely different ideas and principles from those who preceded them, was it not rather idle to pretend that a two-thirds majority was necessary on the question as to whether in a village there should or should not be the public sale of alcoholic liquor? He thought a majority vote was the logical and reasonable proposal. He had, however, accepted a three-fifths majority in the Amendment he had put down. That would be ample to secure that there should not be the sudden changes of opinion on the matter which might be caused by a majority vote, although the experience of other countries did not point to the fact that a three-fifths vote was a more steadfast vote than that of a majority. The history of Cambridge, Massachusetts, was very instructive. It had had a "no licence" vote for twenty years. It was first carried in 1886 by a bare majority, and it had been maintained by a gradually growing majority since then. It was an annual vote, but it had at no time during twenty years reached more than 65 per cent. He had used the phrase "no licence" rather than "prohibition," because there was a very marked distinction between them. The hon. Member for Horsham rather emphasised that there was no logical distinction to be drawn between them. He believed that the same principle underlay "no licence" and "local option"; but "no licence" was not "prohibition." The noble Lord had insisted that the prohibition law had largely failed in Portland, Maine. His contention was that at its worst, so far as drunkenness was concerned, the Maine area would favourably compare with any licensed area in the world. [OPPOSITION cries of "Oh."] If statisticians employed by hon. Members opposite would go into the convictions of people for drunkenness in Portland they would find that they were largely drawn from visitors to that place, and not from residents in the State. But so far as there were breaches of the law in Portland, he thought they might be said to arise as a consequence of the population which was to be found in Portland who were against the prohibition law which was imposed on the State not by their vote but by the vote of people in the rural districts of Maine. That was a possible danger in a prohibition law, but he was not afraid to face the danger, believing as he did that the benefits exceeded the defects. It was a danger arising from a vote over a large area. They might have a rural population desiring prohibition and enforcing it on an urban area which did not want it. It was obvious that such a condition tended to breaches of the law in a way that would not be possible if the vote were taken in and the public-house second, and not the public-house first and the home second, as was too often the case in this country. Another result of local option was a great education of public opinion. In Cambridge, U.S.A., a University and manufacturing town of 100,000 inhabitants, for instance, for six years there was a majority for licence. In the seventh year no-licence was carried, and since then had been carried year after year. No-licence was originally carried by a very small majority—about 400—but the town was now 65 per cent. for no-licence, such had been the education of the community by the operation of the law. Another good effect was its immense restraint on the operations of the liquor traffic. It had good results in raising the standard of conduct in the public-houses. No greater restraint could be put before the eyes of the licensed traders than the knowledge that if their houses were badly conducted, or if they outraged public opinion in their neighbourhood, public opinion would be able to close the houses which had done violence to the feelings of the neighbourhood. That tended to improve the conduct of the public-houses, even where the vote was not in favour of no-licence. These were the effects to be seen in no-licence territory in other countries. There were a certain number of no-licence districts in this country by the favour of landowners, and he claimed that the same results could be shown there. Under the operation of the veto of the people in the United States they had what the liquor trade called a tidal wave. He had read an article in an American liquor-trade paper headed "What shall we do to be saved?" It went on to say that the liquor trade had outstayed its welcome in the United States, and was being swept away by a tidal wave of public opinion. That opinion did not, perhaps, exist here at present to any great extent, although he believed it was stronger than some supposed; but after this Bill had become law, and had been in operation for fifteen years, for it would be fifteen years before a vote could be taken on this question, he believed those who opposed it now would find that they had made a mistake in resisting this social reform, which would enable the people to protect their homes from the demoralising influence of the open public-house. Hon. Members opposite jeered sometimes when this demoralising influence was spoken of, but he believed no Member of this House lived next to a public-house. The licensing justices placed the public-houses near the poor, but there were no public-houses next where the justices lived. This was, in his opinion, a real piece of democratic legislation, and he believed the country was grateful to the Government for it.

MR. ARNOLD-FORSTER (Croydon) said the speech to which the Committee had just listened showed once more the enormous disadvantage which they had been under in discussing this Bill. Up to within an hour or two ago they were absolutely in the dark as to the Government's proposals with regard to one of the most vital principles of the Bill. He did not know now whether it was quite clear how the matter really stood. A great deal had been said by the hon. Member for the Appleby Division of Westmoreland which made it extremely doubtful from the hon. Member's own point of view whether the First Commissioner had placed a correct interpretation on those proposals. The hon. Member had told the Committee that there was to be no local option, or local veto, for fifteen years, but if his arguments were to have any weight at all that was the first thing that should come into effect. The hon. Gentleman had spoken of what the Government were doing now and reminded the Committee that they were not now settling the question of local option. The Opposition asked the Government to give a single precedent for what the Committee was now asked to do. They were still waiting and would wait long for a precedent. What was the use of the Government asking the House to bind Parliament for fourteen years? The thing was grotesque. They could not bind Parliament two years hence. The hon. Member for the Appleby division appeared to take the view too often taken by his friends. He said that the Opposition jeered at the conclusions he tried to force upon them. That was far from being the case. The hon. Gentleman had endeavoured to show in his arguments the value of sobriety and of moderation in the use of drink. With that they all agreed. Where they differed with him was on an entirely different point. They differed as to methods by which that result should be obtained. For the last half hour the hon. Gentleman had been endeavouring to show that his special specific ought to be adopted. It was perfectly true that for forty-four years, ever since Sir Wilfred Lawson introduced his Permissive Bill, the Liberal Party had been in favour of local veto.

*MR. LEIF JONES: I did not say for the whole of that time. Since 1880.

MR. ARNOLD-FORSTER accepted the correction with pleasure. During the whole of the time the Liberal Party had been in favour of some restriction of this kind, and since 1880 they had been specifically in favour of local veto. What had been the history of those forty-four years? How long had the Liberal Party been in power during that period? If they went from Bruce's Bill right down to the present time they could not find a single thing that had been done by the Liberal Party in favour of the principles the hon. Gentleman advocated. The hon. Gentleman went into detail as to the consumption of alcohol and the liquor laws of the United States. He had gone rather far afield for his illustrations; he might have come nearer home. He took the United States and told the Committee of the effect of prohibition in certain areas. But side by side with that they found a steady and constant increase in the consumption of alcoholic liquor in the United States. In 1897 the consumption of beer alone was 1,000,000,000 gallons and in 1906 it was 16,000,000,000 gallons. That was to say it had gone up from 14 to 20 per cent. per head of the population. What was the use of quoting these illustrations of what took place in certain parts of the United States side by side with facts of the kind he had just stated? If they abandoned that point of view, they were driven to the conclusion that some good reason must be found for adopting in this particular regard a restriction which was discarded in every other action of their lives. The hon.

Member quoted sanitary legislation, which he said was as serious an interference with liberty as local option, which he himself had confessed was local prohibition. But did that help the argument? What was the licence? It was a licence to trade. There were scores of licensed trades, the tobacco trade, the liquor trade, chemists—

*MR. LEIF JONES: When I referred to the licensing system I meant the restrictive system which limits the number of licences.

MR. ARNOLD-FORSTER said he would take that definition and ask what application it had to this case. Had it been the object of licensing up to this time to deprive people of a right which they had hitherto enjoyed? Nobody could suggest that the taking of intoxicating liquor was an evil in itself. Yet it was suggested that they should give a locality power, by a small majority, to prevent an individual taking intoxicating liquor. There was no precedent for such legislation. To adduce arguments of that kind was to waste the time of the House. On the Continent of Europe everybody drank, but what harm did they do? Were the countries of Europe drunken countries? One part of France was, and it was a great pity; but how was it proposed to remedy that? Not by local option. It was proposed to remedy that in a way that commended itself to every serious thinker in this country who felt strongly on this question. The hon. Member had said that no Member of this House would allow a public-house to grow up side by side with his private house. Why? Because the whole train of this legislation was to make the public-house a place where persons went to stand up before a zinc counter to drink. He happened recently to be in Bremen, and what did he see there? A great public building in the heart of the city, a building of which any city might be proud, and in the basement of that building a great refreshment room to which all classes went, because everything possible had been done to make it a proper place of rest, refreshment, and recreation. As a due result of this local option Resolution he saw publicans being fined by being made to contribute to a compensation fund. That was the very antithesis to what he would like to see. He would like to see the public-house made into what it was in every country in the world but this. He believed that if a little more energy was shown in making these places proper places of rest and refreshment very little would be heard of local veto. There had been no serious argument at all from the Government in favour of this proposal of local veto. It was not local option, though it was called so in the Bill; it was palpable on the face of it, to any man of reason, that it was local veto and not local option. Since the beginning of this debate they had learned a fact which ought to be clearly realised by everyone, namely, that this was prohibition; it meant that, so far as in them lay, they were giving powers to shut up the whole of the supply of any district, under the operation of this Bill. What was the argument of the right hon. Gentleman? None. They had not had a single argument except that of the hon. Member for the Appleby division of Westmoreland, that if they did introduce this new form of tyranny they would achieve the object desired. They had heard from all quarters of the House arguments based on experiences and research, based indeed on what was much more important, the common sense of those who come and go in the world, that this proposal could not have the effect desired. Under these circumstances it was too much to hope that they could rid themselves of this clause, but it was not too much to hope that by the time, the far off time, when some other Parliament had to deal with this subject, a perhaps very different verdict would be given. Here, as in every other instance, the Government appeared to him to be guilty of the most reprehensible action of putting from their own shoulders the burden which belonged to them. That was what they were doing with the national finance; they were postponing important liabilities which would have to be placed on the shoulders of those who came after them. It was the same with the naval and military services—they were postponing great duties which would have to be performed by those who came after them. And so, in this case concerning morals, they dared not they knew they dared not, and after what had been said by the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the Walton division still less dared they do this thing themselves. They knew that the country would not accept it, and they knew that it would be the ruin of their Party if they attempted it. But they were endeavouring to gain the temporary satisfaction, which he supposed their consciences could feel from the unction which they poured upon themselves, by compelling their followers, willing and unwilling, to vote for this Amendment, and postponing the operation to fourteen years hence.

*MR. KEIR HARDIE (Merthyr Tydvil) said the right hon. Gentleman who had just sat down had taunted the Party opposite with having done nothing for temperance for forty years—which seemed a very good reason why they should pass this Bill. Reference had been made to the débacle which overtook the Liberal Party in 1895, and the hon. Member for the Walton division of Liverpool had placed the responsibility for it on the Temperance Bill of that year. He was one of the victims at that time, and was therefore in a position to speak with some authority on the point. He endorsed the opinion that the Temperance Bill of Sir William Harcourt largely influenced the election of 1895, and adversely to the Party opposite. He believed the reason was not the introduction of the Bill, but the fact that the Bill was not passed through the House of Commons. The measure raised the fighting instincts of the liquor interest, but the fact that it was not persisted in did not rouse the fighting instincts of the temperance forces of the country. As a consequence the Government suffered. He would like to give it as his own opinion that the Party opposite stood to gain considerably in the opinion of the electorate by persisting strenuously with the measure now before the House. The back of the opposition was now broken. Members on the Labour benches were under no delusion as to the probable effects of the Bill. They wanted to see drunkenness diminished, and believed that one means was to reduce the temptations to drink—

Makes ill deeds done.”

Mr. Arnold-Forster.

The first outcome of the Bill would be to weed out the more disreputable public-houses which existed. At the end of fourteen years a new phase of the question was to be entered upon. He desired to deal with subsection (b) of the Amendment now before the House. As far as he could ascertain, the only effect of subsection (b) was to indicate to the Parliament of fourteen years hence what was the opinion of this House of Commons. He would like to see the indication extended somewhat. It was proposed by the Bill, if it became law, to say that at the end of fourteen years the local option provisions should be extended in such a manner as Parliament might determine so as to authorise a resolution limiting the number of licences to the number existing at the time or reducing that number to any less number. He thought the House would be interpreting the sense of the country and of the bulk of temperance opinion if they enlarged the scope of that indication. He could conceive a position of things at the end of fourteen years in which the people would be willing to reduce the number of licences and might even be willing to abolish licences altogether, but would be afraid to take that step because of certain results which might follow. He was sorry the Government had fixed for this purpose a two-thirds majority. He quite admitted that legislation of this kind could not afford to go ahead of public opinion, and that there might be danger, if a bare majority were sufficient to put the Act into operation, of these provisions being evaded. The other week he was in a part of Nova Scotia where the prohibition law was in force. He lunched at an hotel with some friends, and they had a discussion on temperance and the effect of prohibition. One who was present asked him if he would like to see the "Blind Pig." He confessed his ignorance, and was taken to a room at the back of the office, where there were whisky, brandy, wine, beer and all forms of liquor served to those who called for them. He was sure that the House desired that if legislation of this kind was to be put into operation, it should not be evaded in the manner he had indicated. He did not object at all to a considerable majority being required to put the Act into operation, but he thought two-thirds too large, and that a three-fifths majority would be amply sufficient. To come to the point to which he specially desired to call attention, he suggested that the Government might incorporate in subsection (b) words which would place licences in the hands of the municipality or some other form of public control. Such words would indicate what was the opinion of the House, and if what he suggested were adopted, in those areas which were not prepared altogether to prohibit the issue of licences, the people could have an option as to whether such licences as were granted should be in the form of a private monopoly, as at present, or become a public monopoly. The right hon. Member for Croydon had referred to the fact that public-houses, in that part of England at least, had degenerated into places where men and women stood up to drink. The houses no longer possessed their social qualities, and that was true also of houses in the country districts. He knew that in Scotland persons who went to public-houses were very unwelcome visitors unless they kept continually consuming liquor. That was destructive of the ideal public-house which was present in many minds. Where people desired to have a public-house in their midst, many would desire to see it run as a municipal institution, not necessarily to make a profit, but to which a man could go with his wife and children, and where he could enjoy social converse without being under the temptation and compulsion of consuming liquor, as was the case to-day. He should very much like to see a provision of that kind inserted by the Government in this new subsection. He believed a sober population would be good not only for trade but for the national well-being. A mere prohibitory Bill would not produce a sober population. In New Zealand the tide of opinion was rising steadily in favour of prohibition of the liquor traffic, but that was due as much to the comfort and wellbeing of the people as to the teaching of temperance advocates. They desired, first of all, a measure for reducing the number of public-houses, and secondly a measure for empowering the people to say whether they desired liquor shops to be opened or not. What he suggested was that, since they were taking upon themselves the duty of indicating to Parliament fourteen years hence what the opinion of the House was upon this question, they should also indicate the opinion that the power to municipalise the public-house or place it under some other form of effective control should be entrusted to the people as well as the power to abolish or diminish the number of public-houses.

MR. LANE-FOX (Yorkshire, W.R., Pukston Ash) said the hon. Member for Westmoreland had told them that there was a very much stronger feeling in favour of this Bill in the North of England than was generally imagined. He claimed to know something about the North of England, but he ventured to say that if hon. Members opposite gave their vote in the direction indicated it would be the duty of the Opposition to convey that fact to their constituencies, and then he had very little doubt as to what the result would be at the next election. The recent bye-elections had been quoted as evidence of the satisfaction of the people in regard to this Bill, but in his view nothing in the legislation of the present Government stood so much condemned at bye-elections as this Bill. He had taken part in the Newcastle bye-election, and he was told: "It is no use talking here about the Licensing Bill, because it is like a dead horse, for not a single voter will cast his vote in favour of it." They had been invited to protect the homes of the working classes, but he would like to know how they were going to achieve that under this subsection, which would place an enormous premium upon secret drinking in the case of off-licences. There seemed to be some doubt as to the actual meaning of the Bill with the addition made by the Amendment of the First Commissioner of Works. An extraordinary Parliamentary position had been created by this proposal, because on Friday night the whole House voted under the impression that off-licences were to be included in this Bill. That was the opinion of all sections of the House. Now they were told that this was not intended by the Government, but the opinion of the House was distinctly recorded in favour of putting off-licences under this provision. He would like to know whether it was in the power of the Government to reverse the decision of the House at their own sweet will. The hon. Member for Westmoreland was a great believer in small areas, where he said prohibition would do an enormous amount of good, but he said nothing about the areas outside. If they enforced prohibition in one village they would only drive all the drunkards to the next village. What he desired to point out was the gross tyranny which this proposal might inflict upon certain individuals. Under this subsection there was not only complete prohibition, but also partial prohibition. In the case of an election in a particular village there was nothing to prevent a meeting being got up and a two-thirds majority being obtained to close some particular public-house belonging to some individual who for the moment might have rendered himself unpopular upon some particular question. As the subsection was worded it would be far better to have total prohibition or the present system continued. The hon. Member for Westmoreland had quoted the Resolution of the House in favour of local option. But those who had been long in the House of Commons knew the value of academic Resolutions passed on private Members' nights: they were not worth the paper they were written upon. Nothing would please him better than to see the great majority of hon. Members opposite committed to total prohibition. It was because he believed they had absolutely no mandate to bring forward such a provision as this, and because the people were opposed to the whole principle, that he should vote against this Amendment.

*MR. SHERWELL (Huddersfield) said his complaint against the Government, as far as the particular provisions of this clause were concerned, was that they were likely to suffer from an excess of generosity. He thought he was expressing a view largely held on the Ministerial benches when he said that the Government had generously enlarged the area of controversy without any compensation in the form of immediate practical benefit. Speaking for himself alone, he regretted that the Government in dealing with a Bill so complicated in character as this had not seen fit to leave the powers that were to be exercised or might be exercised at the close of the reduction period as the concern of the Parliament whose responsibility it would be to deal with the situation. If, however, the Government desired to give a general indication of the options to be exercised at the end of the time-limit, then he thought their indication should not be framed in such a way as either explicitly or implicitly to exclude other possibilities and other powers. It could hardly be seriously contended that the particular option referred to under this subsection exhausted all the possibilities of Parliamentary action in connection with this great question. He did not think it represented the best method that could be employed in the legislative treatment of this particular question. His own position in the matter was that of one who was deeply conscious not only of the moral but of the social and physical significance of this question. He was specially attracted to a consideration of this subject from its serious economic significance, having regard to the future development of the country. There was no hon. Member of the House who could not but feel that the present expenditure of the people of this country upon alcohol was excessive and ought to be substantially reduced. Therefore, in considering proposals for practical reform, he was bound to ask himself what would be their actual effect in achieving the primary end of legislative reform, namely, a substantial diminution of the expenditure upon drink in this country. The two powers contemplated by the Government were a still further reduction of licences and prohibition by local vote. Personally, he should not be prepared to enlarge the area of controversy for the comparatively unimportant benefits likely to accrue from a still further reduction of licences. He had always held that the value of a reduction of licences as an instrument for reducing drinking had been greatly exaggerated. But if the reduction of licences were the end aimed at why set up such a cumbrous machinery to attain that object? A further reduction of licences could readily be brought about by the application of the economic check of adequate taxation. The present excess in the number of licences was historically due to our failure to apply this economic check. He might be asked how, holding this view, he could support a Bill which included proposals for compulsory reduction by means of monetary payments. His answer was a simple one. The essential feature of this Bill was the settlement of the compensation difficulty by means of a time-limit. But given the enactment of a time-limit no reduction of licences was possible by economic check throughout the whole of the time-limit period. Unless, therefore, he accepted the reduction proposals of the Bill he would be forced to perpetuate an excess of facilities for obtaining drink during the time-limit period. If, however, a further reduction was desired at the end of the time-limit he would accomplish it by adequate taxation. With reference to the second option contemplated in this Bill, namely, local veto by a popular vote, his position could be simply stated. So far as prohibition was likely to be effective in bringing about some diminution in the drink expenditure, he was prepared to welcome it as one amongst other options in a comprehensive scheme. So far as it might achieve that end it should be favourably considered, but as the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Croydon had pointed out, in the United States of America, where prohibitory legislation on the most extensive scale in the world's history had been applied, since 1880 there had been a progressive increase in drinking. Ten years ago the consumption of alcohol in the United States per head of the population was only half that consumed in this country, but during the last five years it had risen to three quarters. He was not suggesting for one moment that the consumption of alcohol in the United States would not have been greater without prohibition, but the conclusion he drew was that there was not in prohibition that prospect or promise of the panacea that was needed. Allusion had been made by the hon. Member for the Appleby Division to the recent great extension of prohibition in America where, next year, eight States in the American Union would come under prohibition. But how far did those States offer them any illustration or evidence of the possibilities of prohibition in this country? In considering the practical application of a particular system they were bound to ascertain how far the general social and economic conditions obtaining in the two countries were alike. The eight prohibition States in America were extremely sparsely peopled, and had an average density of population of only twenty-five persons to the square mile. England and Wales had a density of population of 558 persons to the square mile. A county like Staffordshire had 1,063, whilst Lancashire had a density of population of 2,346 to the square mile, and the West Riding of Yorkshire of over 2,700. It was only when they came to compare social and economic conditions in the two countries that they understood the limits within which local veto was successful in America and elsewhere. The hon. Member for the Appleby Division had reminded them that there were urban districts under prohibition in the United States and he had particularly referred to Massachusetts. What were the prohibition areas in Massachusetts? They were of a strictly suburban character, and in close proximity to Boston. In fact, they had been described as the bedrooms of Boston. Cambridge, to which his hon. friend had referred, was in the closest proximity to Boston, and was for practical purposes a part of the city of Boston. Even in Cambridge, which was a University suburb, with only a small industrial population, the voters in the industrial ward had constantly given a majority against prohibition. He was aware that there were areas in this country where no licences existed, but he drew a sharp distinction between a prohibition enactment on the part of a landlord and one which might withdraw facilities from a neighbourhood where people had been accustomed to have those facilities. The people who went to those areas did so knowing the conditions obtaining there, and the veto was modified by the fact that in close proximity to those areas there were facilities which offered an effective safety valve. Therefore, the existence of these prohibition areas did not offer a fair argument as to the probable operation of local veto over large urban areas in this country. He submitted that it was not enmity to the cause of temperance reform to recognise those facts. He mentioned them because after the closest possible observation and investigation of prohibitory laws all over the world for many years, he had concluded that experience did not justify him in looking forward hopefully to local veto as the sole method of temperance reform in great urban communities. Some of his hon. friends might ask if it did not operate what harm would be done. That argument might be valid from a strictly negative point of view, but he was looking for a positive method of obtaining some substantial reform. He did not want to weary the Committee, but he would like to indicate what was a very deep-rooted conviction in his mind, namely, that the attention of Parliament had taken a wrong direction in considering the methods by which this great evil could be solved. He believed that if any statesman, whether Unionist or Liberal, were deliberately to set himself to find out what was the radical defect in our licensing laws; what it was that, for centuries, and notably during the last century, had defeated the efforts of Parliament, and, despite repeated and multiplied restrictions, had left the evil in its present dimensions, he would be forced to admit that the reason lay in the fact that in their search for remedies they had not gone back to first principles and had not recognised the paradox that lay at the very heart of their licensing question. Their licensing system in its very structure was based upon the assumption that a dangerous trade, which was peculiarly liable to abuse, and capable when abused of infinite mischief to the community, could be safely entrusted to those whose only interest in it was the commercial interest of gain. He was one of those who held that it was in the highest interests of the community that they should have as little expenditure upon alcohol as they possibly could. But it was in the highest interest of the private trader that he should sell as much alcohol as possible. Sooner or later these two opposing forces were bound to come in collision.

and the results which this Committee recognised as deplorable were nothing more than the historic evidence that this inevitable collision had already taken place. He did not blame the publican for that result. It was not his fault, but the fault of the system under which the country had placed him. So long as the publican stood to gain by every glass of beer he sold, so long would he do his best to sell as much as he possibly could. There was not a man in the House who would not do precisely the same thing if he stood in the publican's position. Again, anyone who studied the history of their licensing legislation realised that it was to a large extent a story of baffled effort and repeated failure. Moreover they had never been able to achieve the most moderate instalment of temperance reform without a severe and prolonged struggle with the representatives of the trade. Here again one must not blame the licensed victualler; it was the principle of the system which was at fault. Every licensing reform, whether large or small, even the most moderate of them, was aimed at a diminution of the publican's profits. Therefore they were bound to encounter the organised resistance and opposition of the trade. In this direction lay the fundamental defect of their licensing system. For many years he had pleaded for some Parliamentary recognition of the paradox which lay at the heart of the licensing system and for statutory sanction of the principle of the Gothenburg system, especially as it was carried out in Norway. He did not wish for one moment to be held to suggest that the elimination of private profit from the drink traffic would work as a charm, because he did not think that by itself it would solve the problem. What was the problem? What after all was the explanation of the attraction of the public-house for the average man or woman? Some of his hon. friends would say that it lay in the fascination of the drink. He was not prepared to admit that. Speaking generally they found that a thing fascinated in proportion to some felt deficiency in life. If there was at the bottom of a man's life a deficiency which the community by wise social arrangements did not try to meet, the man himself acting under the compulsion and laws of his own being would try to meet the deficiency in his own way. It was well, perhaps, to disestablish public-houses. It was ill if their efforts were going to stop there. Indeed it might be questioned whether before they abolished the public-house they ought not to seek to put something better in its place. He might be told that the true centre of life was the home. He believed it. But before this Committee gave its sanction to that dictum they should see first of all that the people had homes to stay in. He might be told that the habitué of the public-house would not be drawn by counter attractions if they were provided.

*THE CHAIRMAN: I am sorry to stop the hon. Gentleman, but he is really getting much too wide.

*MR. SHERWELL said he would close with an appeal to the Government to consider whether they could see their way to add to the clause some such words as he had indicated in the Amendment that stood in his name.

MR. WYNDHAM (Dover) said the whole Committee had listened with deep interest to the eloquent and earnest speech of the hon. Member for Huddersfield. Was it too much to hope that that speech might persuade the Government, even at that late hour, to abandon their present project of inviting the House of Commons to take the unprecedented step of trying to control a Parliament which was to meet in fifteen years time? Some supporters of the Government had explained why they supported or differed from them. The hon. Member for Huddersfield had said that he looked forward to a time when there would be higher licence duties; the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydvil hoped to see public-houses put on a different footing; and the hon. Member for Salford, speaking as a democrat, said that if there was to be local option, there should be power to increase as well as diminish facilities. The hon. Member for the Appleby Division alone acquiesced in the course which the Government were asking Parliament to take. If he were to conjecture what the object of the Government was in asking them to take this extraordinary step he should say that probably—he hoped he was not uncharitable—it was to withdraw the question of prohibition as a practical issue from general elections during the next fifteen years. Another thing which had been made perfectly clear in the debate was that this House of Commons contained no willing majority prepared to affirm the principle of prohibition, and that was why it was being shelved for fifteen years. The Amendment was a pious opinion in the sense that it would have no binding force on Parliament in fifteen years time. But, although it could have no effect upon the will and liberty of Parliament in the future, it would exercise a very prejudicial effect on the whole licensing question during that interim. To place an opinion of this kind on the Statute-book was to make the licensing trade of the country a speculative and disreputable business. The two main currents of opinion behind the Government were those who thought they had discovered a gold mine, and those who thought that all opportunities for drinking in public should be abolished. Those two distinct opinions were incompatible, and that was why the Government had not seen its way to tell the House which of the two it intended to take. Perhaps their policy was concealed inside Clause 2, subsection 6. If that was not so, they must mean one of three things—a prohibitionist policy, a Gothenburg policy, or a policy of treating the trade fairly in order that it might be conducted decently for the benefit of the people at large. Instead of getting a better class of house and deriving larger revenues from the trade, the effect of the Amendment would be to make the houses worse and to diminish the revenue.

MR. L. HARCOURT agreed with the statement made by the hon. Member for Huddersfield at the commencement of his interesting speech that the proposal of this Amendment had extended the area of the discussion. If they had succeeded in doing nothing else, they had succeeded in that. They had encouraged the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydvil to debate the question of municipalisation. It had naturally enabled his hon. friend the Member for Huddersfield to deal with the question of disinterested management, and it had led to a much larger and wider discussion than he should himself have expected. Some reproach had been addressed to him by hon. Members opposite that he did not deliver the whole mind and opinion of the Government on the question of local option or local veto. He did not think it now necessary to undertake to debate again a question which had been fully debated in this House on the First and Second Reading of the Bill, namely, the general question of the control of the liquor traffic. That question had been annually and profusely debated in the House for the last forty-four years. Some observations had been made with which he would shortly deal. The hon. Member for Huddersfield said he would have preferred to deal with the liquor traffic on the basis of adequate taxation. That had not been the method which the Government had thought most desirable for the commencement or at the moment, although it was always open for the Government and the House to deal with the liquor traffic by that alternative. His hon. friend spoke of local veto as it appeared in this Bill, as if it were the only alternative which the Government had in their mind. That was not and never had been the case. They would first of all attain during the fourteen years reduction period what they believed would be an improvement in the condition of the trade. He could not imagine how the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Dover could think that the gradual reduction of licences in that term, when the less reputable and most speculative houses would be dealt with, could be anything but a real advantage to the State, to temperance, and to the welfare of everybody concerned.

MR. WYNDHAM said the right hon. Gentleman was misrepresenting him. What he said was that what would make the trade disreputable was the proposal now before the Committee, namely, that a future Parliament was to expose the survivors to the chances of prohibition.

MR. L. HARCOURT said he would tell the Committee why there was only prohibition in the Bill. He admitted that after fourteen years local option practically became prohibition, although it was not actually prohibition. During the currency of the fourteen years reduction period power was given to the locality under the Bill to prohibit the issue of any new licence. That was a local option which he hoped would be largely and wisely exercised in many places. But when they came to the end of the reduction period, if this alteration were not made in the Bill a small majority of the electors, operating upon what would then be technically new licences, but which would mean the old and the new, would be able to obtain absolute prohibition. The Government had proposed this Amendment in order to secure that when that power accrued to the people at the end of fourteen years it should be exercised only by a two-thirds majority. The Government were not providing in the Bill the machinery for future limitation and reduction of licences. The right hon. Gentleman had asked him what he thought would happen in fourteen years. He believed that after fourteen years Parliament would be forced by public opinion to give to the people of this country a very much larger number of options in the management of this trade than anybody now contemplated. Some hon. Gentleman had described subsection (b) as a "pious hope." He did not disclaim the words. The subsection was not of a limiting character. It was true that only two methods of dealing with this traffic were mentioned in it; but they were not mentioned as limits.

SIR THOMAS WHITTAKER (Yorkshire, W.R., Spen Valley): Why mention them at all?

MR. L. HARCOURT said that the reason for mentioning them was that in the past complaint had been made on behalf of the trade that Parliament had not given those concerned sufficient notice of what was likely to happen. The Government did not wish to allow any expectations or sacred rights to grow up during the fourteen years. Though they had not included every option which might in future be given to the people, they had thought it right to notify the trade that in their opinion these prospects and others were things to which it should look forward.

MR. AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN (Worcestershire, E.) said he would not have intervened in the discussion if the right hon. Gentleman had made any effort to cover the ground which his opponents had taken on this question. This was one more illustration of the great difficulties under which the House of Commons laboured when it deliberately bound itself to come to a decision at a particular hour, quite irrespective of what the Government might mean to say or do. He would add to that, that the Government had introduced yet another change in our Parliamentary procedure, apart from their extreme use of closure by compartments, which was a matter of great inconvenience and regret. They had superimposed upon this system of closure by compartments a system of management of Bills by compartment, and different Ministers turned up on different days to deal with the various watertight sections of the Bill, and made speeches that had very little reference to what had gone on in debates that had previously taken place. He hoped that the right hon. Gentleman would not think that he complained of his conduct of the Bill so far as that was a matter personal to himself. What had happened that day? The right hon. Gentleman in one of the very few observations with which he had favoured the House, observed that the right hon. Member for Dover was wrong in supposing that any deleterious effect would accrue to this trade in the next fourteen years by the suppressing during that time of at least one-third of the licences, and said that it would be the least reputable of public-houses that would be closed during that period. But how did that agree with the speeches and action of his colleagues when they selected, to use his own term, the least reputable public-houses to receive compensation for the loss of licences? The houses which had the smallest claim to considerate treatment were to receive this compensation at the hands of the more reputable licence-holders who themselves were to be deprived of any compensation. Really this kind of argument on the question immediately under discussion without any reference to what had gone before, and without any regard to what might come after, led the Government and the House of Commons into positions of intolerable inconsistency and would lead to great hardship in legislation. The right hon. Gentleman had not had a word to say in defence of the proposal which he had advanced, to the surprise of both sides of the House, for excluding off-licences from the proposal under discussion. He at once stated there was a great deal to be said on one side and the other, but the Government said nothing at all. It only put down an Amendment which included these licences one day, and on another day announced an intention of altering the Amendment so as to exclude them on the Report stage of the Bill. That was making Parliamentary procedure a farce.

MR. L. HARCOURT said he had not gone into this matter because he understood that it was not germane to that day's discussion.

MR. AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN thought it was germane to the discussion. The right hon. Gentleman must know that they had heard that day some of the most interesting speeches delivered during the debates, many of them fruitful of good suggestions, and coming nearest to the heart of this question. He had listened to the speeches of hon. Gentlemen, not only amongst his own friends, but speeches from Gentlemen with whom he did not act, and with whom he did not ordinarily agree. The hon. Member for Huddersfield had made a most remarkable speech drawn from rich stores of knowledge, and he ventured to say that it struck at the whole root of the proposal which the Government had asked them to adopt. The hon. Member for Merthyr Tydvil also made a speech earlier in the evening, which, although there was a great deal in it with which he could not agree, pointed in the same way to the inefficacy of the remedy which the Government had proposed as a cure for the evils of intemperance, and the possibility of making people sober by any measure of prohibition, and the necessity, referred to by the hon. Member for Huddersfield and which the Opposition had tried to press on the House, of devoting attention not to suppressing these evils in isolated districts by small majorities, but by establishing more wholesome businesses throughout the length and breadth of the land wherever these were required by the necessities and convenience of the people. The discussion had turned on the question whether they were to indicate to the country and future Parliaments their opinion that at the expiration of the time-limit licences should be subject to the operation of local veto. He asked the Government why they had selected certain licences as licences which were to be subjected to this local veto, and on what grounds they excluded others, the evils arising from which were admitted on all hands, though they might, just as the ordinary on-licence did in many cases, serve a very useful and a harmless purpose. If the remedy was good in one case it was good in the other; if it was bad in one case, it was bad in the other. The action of the Government was wholly inconsistent in itself, wholly inconsistent with what they had been told the previous day; it was unexplained, he believed, because it was inexplicable to themselves, or by any reason which could be given either in the House or in the country.

SIR THOMAS WHITTAKER said that when the First Commissioner of Works was speaking he had asked him what was the reason for putting Paragraph (b) in his Amendment on the Paper, but he did not feel that the explanation of the right hon. Gentleman was at all satisfactory. This was an instruction at least fourteen years ahead to future Parliaments as to what they were to do. Now, he quite agreed that it was essential that there should be no misunderstanding that at the end of the time-limit, fourteen years hence, the nation should be at full liberty to deal in the freest and most extensive manner with all licences, and he was ready to assent to the insertion of such an intimation as might be necessary for that purpose. In subsection (2) of

Clause 3 there was an indication that Parliament should be free to enact prohibition, or other methods of reducing licences; but in the Amendment which the right hon. Gentleman had now on the Paper nothing was said about prohibition; it was merely a matter of reducing, or retaining licences as they were. It not being necessary to put in prohibition, it was perfectly clear that it was felt that Parliament in the future would have the fullest power, and that there might be prohibition. But the right hon. Gentleman said that he anticipated that at the expiration of the time-limit, when they would have full control and freedom, there would be methods of dealing with the trade of which nobody now dreamed. If that were so, why should they do anything which would limit it in this kind of way? If it were necessary to give this notice of any of these various ways of dealing with the trade to which the right hon. Gentleman referred, surely in this Paragraph (b) they ought to give notice of all of them. If the notice were required at all it ought to be notice of all of them. It ought to have its full scope, and if they only gave notice of some of them surely that was limiting the law. It appeared to him that this Paragraph (b) was not necessary. It was not necessary to intimate to future Parliaments what they ought to do at all. They would have the fullest liberty, and there was no necessity to have anything of the kind. He entered the strongest protest against this Paragraph (b) being left in, as Paragraphs (a) and (c) covered the full ground. No substantial reason whatever had been given for its inclusion, and he thought that even now they ought to insist that the paragraph should be dropped out, as there was no necessity for it.

VISCOUNT CASTLEREAGH (Maidstone) said he had listened with interest to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman who had just sat down, and also to that of the hon. Gentleman the Member for the Appleby Division of Westmoreland, and he could only say that it appeared to him a very curious thing that these gentlemen who claimed to be the advocates of temperance should be so singularly immoderate in their dealing with other people's property, and other people's liberties. He noticed also, in the speech of the hon. Member for Appleby, that he was desirous of prohibiting hon. Members from travelling abroad, and satisfying themselves as to what went on in localities there. [Cries of "No."] He thought that was what the hon. Member said.

*MR. LEIF JONES: No; I should be very glad if the noble Lord would go abroad.

VISCOUNT CASTLEREAGH thanked the hon. Member very much, and said he could assure him that he had been abroad, and on this subject had had as many opportunities of satisfying himself as the hon. Gentleman himself. He had heard no reason of an adequate character that afternoon in favour of this local option or local veto. They had heard various instances of how local veto had been put into operation, and he did not think in one single instance could it be claimed to be successful. They had often discussed the question of local veto in this House. It had been discussed for forty-four years. An academic vote had been given, but the discussion had been of the most unsatisfactory character, and he ventured to join issue with the hon. Gentleman in saying that the people of this country were in any way unanimous in their views as to local veto. The last time it was put before the electors was in 1895, and, notwithstanding all that the late Chairman of the Labour Party had said, he was convinced that the people of the country gave their decision emphatically against it, and he believed that would hold good to-day. Hon. Gentlemen put forward the question of local veto on the grounds of "trust the people," but he ventured to disagree with the suggestion altogether, because it was not a case of trusting the people. If the people would only do what the temperance faddists on the other side of the House desired they could have their way, but if they desired, on the other hand, perhaps to increase the number of licences, then they were not, under any circumstances, to be allowed to do so. He certainly thought that the situation that had arisen to-day was one of the most astounding character. They heard that the licensing trade should have known perfectly well what was in the Bill which the Government was going to bring in, and have made arrangements accordingly, but from what he had seen, it appeared to him that the Government themselves did not know what was in the Bill, nor did they appear to know what was going from day to day to be put into their Bill. There appeared to be certain anomalies with regard to the Bill. One of them was spoken of by his right hon. friend the Member for Dover, and that was with regard to the houses that would have an auxiliary licence. Under the Bill, as it at present stood, licensing justices were allowed to override—if he might use the expression—local wishes in these cases, subject, of course, to the Licensing Commission. He understood that according to the Bill the Licensing Commission came to an end after a period of fourteen years, and what he wanted to ask the right hon. Gentleman was, if the Licensing Commission did come to an end at the end of fourteen years, what was the position of those licences which were held as auxiliary? Were they to come under prohibition or were they to be in the jurisdiction of the local licensing justices? He certainly hoped that if the Bill went on the Government would take some steps to instruct themselves with regard to their own measure, and if it was going to become law, as he sincerely hoped it would not, that these anomalies with which the Bill was brimful, would be removed as speedily as possible.

*MR. BENNETT (Oxfordshire, Woodstock) said he wished to endorse every word which had fallen from the lips of the hon. Members for Spen Valley and Huddersfield, and to make his appeal with them that the Government would recast this objectionable paragraph or leave it out altogether. A long quotation had been given from an article of his in the Nineteenth Century with regard to prohibition, but he would point out that he was referring to State prohibition, which was a very different thing to anything contemplated in the Bill, and to the populous town of Portland. They were taunted with the fate of the Liberal Party when they next faced the electors, but they were prepared to take their chance. ["When?"] When they liked, and he supposed that every thoughtful Member on that side knew perfectly well that any Government which tackled this question ran electoral risks, but simply because the Government was prepared to take these risks it deserved their warmest support. With regard to this Amendment, he confessed that he joined hands with nearly every speaker that afternoon, and that he was very sceptical indeed as to the utility of legislating in 1908 about the precise methods of local option which were to be applied fourteen years hence in 1923. Temperance sentiment and temperance effort in this country might perhaps develop along different lines and assume a different complexion during so long a period as fourteen years. Nor in any case did he imagine that their successors, or those of themselves who survived with the public-houses would in 1923 feel themselves at all bound by what would probably be then regarded as an almost obsolete section of the Act. But, if the Government insisted on specifying now the methods of popular control which were to be exercised when the temperance millennium was inaugurated in 1923, he ventured to say that in the opinion of many of them the scope of their proposals was too narrow. Why should the broad general principle of local option be narrowed down to the two methods of "limitation" and "prohibition?" Few of them on those benches had any quarrel with the principle of local option, even in the narrower sense contemplated in the Amendment, provided it was carried out on reasonable lines, and with a due regard for the opinions and habits of considerable minorities. But they must remember that by 1923 the number of the licensed premises which survived the process of elimination would ex hypothesi have been reduced to the sensible limits prescribed in the Bill, and in some cases would correspond more or less to the normal and legitimate needs of the people. There would be far less need, so to speak, for local option in 1923 than any which arose now amid all those fatal facilities for securing liquor which unfortunately existed around them that day. Further, many of them who yielded to none in their earnest desire to see effective temperance reform an accomplished fact, believed that the late Mr. Gladstone was right when he described local option as "only a partial and occasional remedy." Local veto would probably tend to be least effective in districts which needed it most; and as to that far-off event, total prohibition, to which the whole cosmos of the United Kingdom Alliance was moving, well, he had seen enough of prohibition in the United States and Norway to lead him to realise the truth of the statement that prohibition might be both practicable and beneficial in sparsely populated districts, but that it was almost impossible to enforce it in larger centres of population. Why, then, as he said, were they to lay down definitely in 1908 that in 1923 local option was to be exercised solely for the reduction or prohibition of licensed premises? Why should other methods of local control be rigidly excluded? Why, for example, should local veto be inserted, while the option of disinterested company management was left out? The advocacy and support of this form of local option had been the definite policy for years past of the Temperance Legislation League, which numbered amongst its members nearly every bishop of the Anglican Church, practically every Nonconformist divine of eminence, 150 Members of Parliament, and a very large number of distinguished and public-spirited men and women of various political parties. In short, he could assure the Committee that in intellect and moral worth, experience and knowledge of affairs, they compared very favourably with some of those gentlemen who, under the banner of Messrs. Kempster, Malins, Hayler, et hoc genus omne, missed no opportunity of hurling abuse at those of their fellow-workers in the field of temperance who refused to bow the knee exclusively to prohibition as the one great panacea of the drink evil. That, of course, was not the time or occasion in which to enter into any description of the option to which he referred, that of disinterested company management. It was not the fault of the Temperance Legislation League if the scheme was not by this time thoroughly understood by the hon. Members of that House. He would only add one note of personal experience. He knew a good deal about Norway, as he had visited it almost every year for the last fifteen years. He had lived in the interior and in the towns on the coast, and for the last six years he had spent some five weeks every year in one of the Lofoden islands. That island was under prohibition. It was a mountainous and sparsely populated island, and it was an earthly paradise. It had no crime, and one small policeman enjoyed a sinecure existence in one of the more remote islands of the group. But let them take some other parts of Norway. He had during the last fifteen years written to and talked with a large number of representative Norwegians—members of the Storting, clergymen, doctors, farmers, tradesmen, working-men—on the subject of the Samlag or company system. The chorus of approval was practically unanimous. One and all agreed that the Samlag had conferred incalculable blessings upon their nation, and had been a prime agent in rendering Norway one of the two most sober countries in Europe. He had met Good Templars in the islands and elsewhere, and they, like the Good Templars here, regarded prohibition as the ultimate ideal to be attained. At the same time they were willing to recognise the immense benefits conferred by the Samlag, and in any case infinitely preferred it to the mischievous system of private sale and private profit which had previously existed. He did not think the request they made that afternoon was other than a reasonable one. All they asked was that the Government should either by the deletion of some words, or by the addition of some words, give all temperance reformers a fair field and no favour. All they said was that if the trade could not be eradicated it should be regulated. He hoped the Government would see its way to meet the wishes of his friends and himself.

SIR GILBERT PARKER (Gravesend) expressed the opinion that no one could have listened to the debate which had taken place without feeling a sense of the absolute futility of the Amendment brought forward by the Government. The discussion that day had been the most severe criticism of the Bill since the debates upon it had been opened in the House. They had listened to speeches from earnest temperance reformers, who, like the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down, had experience and observation behind them, and who had shown that the one thing that this Bill aimed at—temperance—was not being achieved by any clause in it. The hon. Gentleman who had just sat down had said that the Amendment which had been moved was inadequate, and gave no opportunity to anyone except those who were for absolute prohibition. But it did not give them a chance. The right hon. Gentleman had said not a word upon the Amendment which he had brought in. If this Amendment was to be moved at all, and if the principle of local option was to be embodied in the Bill, it certainly ought to have been supported by some reason from the right hon. Gentleman. The hon. Member for the Appleby Division attempted to give some reason why local option should be incorporated in principle in the Bill. The hon. Member had been impressed with the effect of local option in Canada, the United States, New Zealand, and Norway, but the hon. Member for Woodstock had made it perfectly clear that he did not find that prohibition in Norway had been effectual in reducing the number of cases of drunkenness.

MR. BENNETT: I laid stress on the fact that prohibition was effective in sparsely-populated districts.

SIR GILBERT PARKER contended that prohibition applied to the national life of a country would not be effective. The hon. Member had said it was effective in a sparsely-populated district, but here we had a small island, the smallest country in the hemisphere, with a crowded population, and the proposal before the Committee was an attempt to introduce into this small geographical area a system of stopping intemperance by local option. It was not effective in Norway. It had not been effective anywhere where it had been tried. In the areas in Canada where it had been tried drunkenness was greater than in parts where prohibition did not exist. In

Prince Edward's Island one person in every 341 was convicted of drunkenness. In Ontario one in every 128. There was no local option in Ontario. Wherever it had been tried in Ontario under the Scott Act it had been a failure. What had been noticed in Australia, New Zealand and Canada, was that the spirit of evasion which had been engendered by the introduction of local option—the desire to evade the law—had deteriorated the moral character of the people in the areas where it had been applied. One of the mayors in New Brunswick, speaking to the City Council in Moncton, said that the law should be better carried out; that it was quite apparent that the consumption of liquor in the city was on the increase and drunkenness was very prevalent, especially among youths; that most bar-rooms remained open night and day, and that no attempt was made to stop that state of affairs. That was in a district where local veto had been applied. As the hon. Member had said, in urban areas local option did not succeed. It was easy to make it succeed in sparsely-populated districts. There was no temptation to drink there. The rules of life in such districts were much healthier. The habit of drinking sprang from a fundamental want in the lives of the people who lived under hard conditions. If a temperance measure was intended by the Government the Bill should have contained a far wider system of local option than was contained in this Amendment—an Amendment which had not been supported by a single argument on the part of the right hon. Gentleman who moved it. He did not believe that local option would be beneficial to this country, but the Government did, and had brought in this Amendment to embody it in the Bill. The national character of a people was not often affected by legislation, but if it was, it would be affected deleteriously by legislation of this character. If any effect was to be produced at all by temperance legislation the effect should be the strengthening and the development of the best qualities of the local life of the people. Where local option had been tried it had resulted in deteriorating and destroying to a considerable extent the quality and efficiency and simplicity which ought to belong to the lives of the

say that probably—he hoped he was not uncharitable—it was to withdraw the question of prohibition as a practical issue from general elections during the next fifteen years. Another thing which had been made perfectly clear in the debate was that this House of Commons contained no willing majority prepared to affirm the principle of prohibition, and that was why it was being shelved for fifteen years. The Amendment was a pious opinion in the sense that it would have no binding force on Parliament in fifteen years time. But, although it could have no effect upon the will and liberty of Parliament in the future, it would exercise a very prejudicial effect on the whole licensing question during that interim. To place an opinion of this kind on the Statute-book was to make the licensing trade of the country a speculative and disreputable business. The two main currents of opinion behind the Government were those who thought they had discovered a gold mine, and those who thought that all opportunities for drinking in public should be abolished. Those two distinct opinions were incompatible, and that was why the Government had not seen its way to tell the House which of the two it intended to take. Perhaps their policy was concealed inside Clause 2, subsection 6. If that was not so, they must mean one of three things—a prohibitionist policy, a Gothenburg policy, or a policy of treating the trade fairly in order that it might be conducted decently for the benefit of the people at large. Instead of getting a better class of house and deriving larger revenues from the trade, the effect of the Amendment would be to make the houses worse and to diminish the revenue.

MR. L. HARCOURT agreed with the statement made by the hon. Member for Huddersfield at the commencement of his interesting speech that the proposal of this Amendment had extended the area of the discussion. If they had succeeded in doing nothing else, they had succeeded in that. They had encouraged the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydvil to debate the question of municipalisation. It had naturally enabled his hon. friend the Member for Huddersfield to deal with the question of disinterested management, and it had led to a much larger and wider discussion than he should himself have expected. Some reproach had been addressed to him by hon. Members opposite that he did not deliver the whole mind and opinion of the Government on the question of local option or local veto. He did not think it now necessary to undertake to debate again a question which had been fully debated in this House on the First and Second Reading of the Bill, namely, the general question of the control of the liquor traffic. That question had been annually and profusely debated in the House for the last forty-four years. Some observations had been made with which he would shortly deal. The hon. Member for Huddersfield said he would have preferred to deal with the liquor traffic on the basis of adequate taxation. That had not been the method which the Government had thought most desirable for the commencement or at the moment, although it was always open for the Government and the House to deal with the liquor traffic by that alternative. His hon. friend spoke of local veto as it appeared in this Bill, as if it were the only alternative which the Government had in their mind. That was not and never had been the case. They would first of all attain during the fourteen years reduction period what they believed would be an improvement in the condition of the trade. He could not imagine how the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Dover could think that the gradual reduction of licences in that term, when the less reputable and most speculative houses would be dealt with, could be anything but a real advantage to the State, to temperance, and to the welfare of everybody concerned.

MR. WYNDHAM said the right hon. Gentleman was misrepresenting him. What he said was that what would make the trade disreputable was the proposal now before the Committee, namely, that a future Parliament was to expose the survivors to the chances of prohibition.

MR. L. HARCOURT said he would tell the Committee why there was only prohibition in the Bill. He admitted that after fourteen years local option practically became prohibition, although it was not actually prohibition. During the currency of the fourteen years reduction period power was given to the locality under the Bill to prohibit the issue of any new licence. That was a local option which he hoped would be largely and wisely exercised in many places. But when they came to the end of the reduction period, if this alteration were not made in the Bill a small majority of the electors, operating upon what would then be technically new licences, but which would mean the old and the new, would be able to obtain absolute prohibition. The Government had proposed this Amendment in order to secure that when that power accrued to the people at the end of fourteen years it should be exercised only by a two-thirds majority. The Government were not providing in the Bill the machinery for future limitation and reduction of licences. The right hon. Gentleman had asked him what he thought would happen in fourteen years. He believed that after fourteen years Parliament would be forced by public opinion to give to the people of this country a very much larger number of options in the management of this trade than anybody now contemplated. Some hon. Gentleman had described subsection (b) as a "pious hope." He did not disclaim the words. The subsection was not of a limiting character. It was true that only two methods of dealing with this traffic were mentioned in it; but they were not mentioned as limits.

SIR THOMAS WHITTAKER (Yorkshire, W.R., Spen Valley): Why mention them at all?

MR. L. HARCOURT said that the reason for mentioning them was that in the past complaint had been made on behalf of the trade that Parliament had not given those concerned sufficient notice of what was likely to happen. The Government did not wish to allow any expectations or sacred rights to grow up during the fourteen years. Though they had not included every option which might in future be given to the people, they had thought it right to notify the trade that in their opinion these prospects and others were things to which it should look forward.

MR. AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN (Worcestershire, E.) said he would not have intervened in the discussion if the right hon. Gentleman had made any effort to cover the ground which his opponents had taken on this question. This was one more illustration of the great difficulties under which the House of Commons laboured when it deliberately bound itself to come to a decision at a particular hour, quite irrespective of what the Government might mean to say or do. He would add to that, that the Government had introduced yet another change in our Parliamentary procedure, apart from their extreme use of closure by compartments, which was a matter of great inconvenience and regret. They had superimposed upon this system of closure by compartments a system of management of Bills by compartment, and different Ministers turned up on different days to deal with the various watertight sections of the Bill, and made speeches that had very little reference to what had gone on in debates that had previously taken place. He hoped that the right hon. Gentleman would not think that he complained of his conduct of the Bill so far as that was a matter personal to himself. What had happened that day? The right hon. Gentleman in one of the very few observations with which he had favoured the House, observed that the right hon. Member for Dover was wrong in supposing that any deleterious effect would accrue to this trade in the next fourteen years by the suppressing during that time of at least one-third of the licences, and said that it would be the least reputable of public-houses that would be closed during that period. But how did that agree with the speeches and action of his colleagues when they selected, to use his own term, the least reputable public-houses to receive compensation for the loss of licences? The houses which had the smallest claim to considerate treatment were to receive this compensation at the hands of the more reputable licence-holders who themselves were to be deprived of any compensation. Really this kind of argument on the question immediately under discussion without any reference to what had gone before, and without any regard to what might come after, led the Government and the House of Commons into positions of intolerable inconsistency and would lead to great hardship in legislation. The right hon. Gentleman had not had a word to say in defence of the proposal which he had advanced, to the surprise of both sides of the House, for excluding off-licences from the proposal under discussion. He at once stated there was a great deal to be said on one side and the other, but the Government said nothing at all. It only put down an Amendment which included these licences one day, and on another day announced an intention of altering the Amendment so as to exclude them on the Report stage of the Bill. That was making Parliamentary procedure a farce.

MR. L. HARCOURT said he had not gone into this matter because he understood that it was not germane to that day's discussion.

MR. AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN thought it was germane to the discussion. The right hon. Gentleman must know that they had heard that day some of the most interesting speeches delivered during the debates, many of them fruitful of good suggestions, and coming nearest to the heart of this question. He had listened to the speeches of hon. Gentlemen, not only amongst his own friends, but speeches from Gentlemen with whom he did not act, and with whom he did not ordinarily agree. The hon. Member for Huddersfield had made a most remarkable speech drawn from rich stores of knowledge, and he ventured to say that it struck at the whole root of the proposal which the Government had asked them to adopt. The hon. Member for Merthyr Tydvil also made a speech earlier in the evening, which, although there was a great deal in it with which he could not agree, pointed in the same way to the inefficacy of the remedy which the Government had proposed as a cure for the evils of intemperance, and the possibility of making people sober by any measure of prohibition, and the necessity, referred to by the hon. Member for Huddersfield and which the Opposition had tried to press on the House, of devoting attention not to suppressing these evils in isolated districts by small majorities, but by establishing more wholesome businesses throughout the length and breadth of the land wherever these were required by the necessities and convenience of the people. The discussion had turned on the question whether they were to indicate to the country and future Parliaments their opinion that at the expiration of the time-limit licences should be subject to the operation of local veto. He asked the Government why they had selected certain licences as licences which were to be subjected to this local veto, and on what grounds they excluded others, the evils arising from which were admitted on all hands, though they might, just as the ordinary on-licence did in many cases, serve a very useful and a harmless purpose. If the remedy was good in one case it was good in the other; if it was bad in one case, it was bad in the other. The action of the Government was wholly inconsistent in itself, wholly inconsistent with what they had been told the previous day; it was unexplained, he believed, because it was inexplicable to themselves, or by any reason which could be given either in the House or in the country.

SIR THOMAS WHITTAKER said that when the First Commissioner of Works was speaking he had asked him what was the reason for putting Paragraph (b) in his Amendment on the Paper, but he did not feel that the explanation of the right hon. Gentleman was at all satisfactory. This was an instruction at least fourteen years ahead to future Parliaments as to what they were to do. Now, he quite agreed that it was essential that there should be no misunderstanding that at the end of the time-limit, fourteen years hence, the nation should be at full liberty to deal in the freest and most extensive manner with all licences, and he was ready to assent to the insertion of such an intimation as might be necessary for that purpose. In subsection (2) of

Clause 3 there was an indication that Parliament should be free to enact prohibition, or other methods of reducing licences; but in the Amendment which the right hon. Gentleman had now on the Paper nothing was said about prohibition; it was merely a matter of reducing, or retaining licences as they were. It not being necessary to put in prohibition, it was perfectly clear that it was felt that Parliament in the future would have the fullest power, and that there might be prohibition. But the right hon. Gentleman said that he anticipated that at the expiration of the time-limit, when they would have full control and freedom, there would be methods of dealing with the trade of which nobody now dreamed. If that were so, why should they do anything which would limit it in this kind of way? If it were necessary to give this notice of any of these various ways of dealing with the trade to which the right hon. Gentleman referred, surely in this Paragraph (b) they ought to give notice of all of them. If the notice were required at all it ought to be notice of all of them. It ought to have its full scope, and if they only gave notice of some of them surely that was limiting the law. It appeared to him that this Paragraph (b) was not necessary. It was not necessary to intimate to future Parliaments what they ought to do at all. They would have the fullest liberty, and there was no necessity to have anything of the kind. He entered the strongest protest against this Paragraph (b) being left in, as Paragraphs (a) and (c) covered the full ground. No substantial reason whatever had been given for its inclusion, and he thought that even now they ought to insist that the paragraph should be dropped out, as there was no necessity for it.

VISCOUNT CASTLEREAGH (Maidstone) said he had listened with interest to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman who had just sat down, and also to that of the hon. Gentleman the Member for the Appleby Division of Westmoreland, and he could only say that it appeared to him a very curious thing that these gentlemen who claimed to be the advocates of temperance should be so singularly immoderate in their dealing with other people's property, and other people's liberties. He noticed also, in the speech of the hon. Member for Appleby, that he was desirous of prohibiting hon. Members from travelling abroad, and satisfying themselves as to what went on in localities there. [Cries of "No."] He thought that was what the hon. Member said.

*MR. LEIF JONES: No; I should be very glad if the noble Lord would go abroad.

VISCOUNT CASTLEREAGH thanked the hon. Member very much, and said he could assure him that he had been abroad, and on this subject had had as many opportunities of satisfying himself as the hon. Gentleman himself. He had heard no reason of an adequate character that afternoon in favour of this local option or local veto. They had heard various instances of how local veto had been put into operation, and he did not think in one single instance could it be claimed to be successful. They had often discussed the question of local veto in this House. It had been discussed for forty-four years. An academic vote had been given, but the discussion had been of the most unsatisfactory character, and he ventured to join issue with the hon. Gentleman in saying that the people of this country were in any way unanimous in their views as to local veto. The last time it was put before the electors was in 1895, and, notwithstanding all that the late Chairman of the Labour Party had said, he was convinced that the people of the country gave their decision emphatically against it, and he believed that would hold good to-day. Hon. Gentlemen put forward the question of local veto on the grounds of "trust the people," but he ventured to disagree with the suggestion altogether, because it was not a case of trusting the people. If the people would only do what the temperance faddists on the other side of the House desired they could have their way, but if they desired, on the other hand, perhaps to increase the number of licences, then they were not, under any circumstances, to be allowed to do so. He certainly thought that the situation that had arisen to-day was one of the most astounding character. They heard that the most severe criticism of the Bill since the debates upon it had been opened in the House. They had listened to speeches from earnest temperance reformers, who, like the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down, had experience and observation behind them, and who had shown that the one thing that this Bill aimed at—temperance—was not being achieved by any clause in it. The hon. Gentleman who had just sat down had said that the Amendment which had been moved was inadequate, and gave no opportunity to anyone except those who were for absolute prohibition. But it did not give them a chance. The right hon. Gentleman had said not a word upon the Amendment which he had brought in. If this Amendment was to be moved at all, and if the principle of local option was to be embodied in the Bill, it certainly ought to have been supported by some reason from the right hon. Gentleman. The hon. Member for the Appleby Division attempted to give some reason why local option should be incorporated in principle in the Bill. The hon. Member had been impressed with the effect of local option in Canada, the United States, New Zealand, and Norway, but the hon. Member for Woodstock had made it perfectly clear that he did not find that prohibition in Norway had been effectual in reducing the number of cases of drunkenness.

MR. BENNETT: I laid stress on the fact that prohibition was effective in sparsely-populated districts.

SIR GILBERT PARKER contended that prohibition applied to the national life of a country would not be effective. The hon. Member had said it was effective in a sparsely-populated district, but here we had a small island, the smallest country in the hemisphere, with a crowded population, and the proposal before the Committee was an attempt to introduce into this small geographical area a system of stopping intemperance by local option. It was not effective in Norway. It had not been effective anywhere where it had been tried. In the areas in Canada where it had been tried drunkenness was greater than in parts where prohibition did not exist. In

Prince Edward's Island one person in every 341 was convicted of drunkenness. In Ontario one in every 128. There was no local option in Ontario. Wherever it had been tried in Ontario under the Scott Act it had been a failure. What had been noticed in Australia, New Zealand and Canada, was that the spirit of evasion which had been engendered by the introduction of local option—the desire to evade the law—had deteriorated the moral character of the people in the areas where it had been applied. One of the mayors in New Brunswick, speaking to the City Council in Moncton, said that the law should be better carried out; that it was quite apparent that the consumption of liquor in the city was on the increase and drunkenness was very prevalent, especially among youths; that most bar-rooms remained open night and day, and that no attempt was made to stop that state of affairs. That was in a district where local veto had been applied. As the hon. Member had said, in urban areas local option did not succeed. It was easy to make it succeed in sparsely-populated districts. There was no temptation to drink there. The rules of life in such districts were much healthier. The habit of drinking sprang from a fundamental want in the lives of the people who lived under hard conditions. If a temperance measure was intended by the Government the Bill should have contained a far wider system of local option than was contained in this Amendment—an Amendment which had not been supported by a single argument on the part of the right hon. Gentleman who moved it. He did not believe that local option would be beneficial to this country, but the Government did, and had brought in this Amendment to embody it in the Bill. The national character of a people was not often affected by legislation, but if it was, it would be affected deleteriously by legislation of this character. If any effect was to be produced at all by temperance legislation the effect should be the strengthening and the development of the best qualities of the local life of the people. Where local option had been tried it had resulted in deteriorating and destroying to a considerable extent the quality and efficiency and simplicity which ought to belong to the lives of the people. He thought this Amendment had defeated itself in the opinion of the House, and if it was supported in the lobby it would only be by the assistance of the Government Whips and not because those who sat in the House were convinced of its utility or manliness.

LORD WILLOUGHBY DE ERESBY (Lincolnshire, Horncastle) said that, as he understood this Amendment, if it were carried it would put into the hands of a locality the power to close the public-houses if they obtained a two-thirds majority, but that if the Licensing Commissioners were willing they might grant licences to hotels. That meant that the rich would vote for the closing of the public-houses, and the hotels which they used would be kept open.

And, it being half-past Seven of the Clock, the CHAIRMAN proceeded, in pursuance of the Order of the House of the 17th July, to put forthwith the Question on the Amendment already proposed from the Chair.

Question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause," put, and negatived.

Question put, "That those words be there added."

Clause 4 :

MR. SAMUEL ROBERTS (Sheffield, Ecclesall) moved to omit subsection 1. The object of the subsection was to give discretionary power to licensing justices to extinguish licences over and above that required to be compulsorily done by the Bill, subject to the financial provisions. The financial provisions were that before the licensing justices could do this they had to get the consent of the Licensing Commission, and also that the Licensing Commission should not give their consent unless they kept the total of the compensation levy at rates not more than those mentioned in the second schedule. He entirely objected to any compulsory reduction at all. The Act of 1904 was acting extremely well, and was fulfilling the purpose for which it was passed, namely, to give discretion to the justices in their own district, subject to Quarter Sessions, to reduce licences where they thought they were redundant, and if they extinguished licences to give due and proper market value. This extra reduction could only be carried out by an extra payment by the Licensing Commission if they had satisfied all the sums they had to pay out to fulfil the statutory reduction. If they made this extra payment they would make it at the expense of other districts in England and Wales, because if the amount was kept up to the total compensation levy in Schedule 2, the only monies which they would have to dispense would be the balances after they had met their statutory obligations. He should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he could give any calculations as to the amount of balances they anticipated. Were they anticipating that the compensation levy would be kept up to this maximum, because the amount of compensation which they would have to pay when the licences were extinguished would be far less than was being paid at present, because there was a reduction period. Every year the payments which they would have to make would be less, because they were only to pay the purchase value of the annuity, and, therefore, the less number of years the less the money which they would have to pay. He expected the Government were anticipating that the Licensing Commission would have large balances to dispose of. How were they going to dispose of them? Were they going to grant the application of some licensing benches to avail themselves of this section and reduce beyond the statutory obligation? Had the Government calculated the amount of compensation which would have to be paid? The estimate was that, taking the average of the reduction period, it would only be about one-fifteenth of that payable under the Act of 1904, and for the first year the calculation was that it would be about one-fifth. He had fourteen actual cases which had been compensated under the Act of 1904, and the average per licence worked out at £1,076. If the principle of the Bill had been in operation the average per licence would have been only £69 10s. The Government were, therefore, going to have large funds in hand. What were they going to do with them? Were they going to keep up the compensation levies? They ought not to do it. The compensation levy ought to be reduced as the period of reduction lapsed, and they ought not, so to speak, to force the pace and allow more money to be spent. There was another way in which they would be able to dispose of these licences. Under Clause 9 a further reduction could be carried out by Resolution for Wales, and it might be that the Government would have demands upon them to meet large payments for Wales. Were these payments to be made out of monies contributed from England? It would be a very great grievance to the licence-holders in this country to have to pay over to the compensation fund to compensate other districts. At the present moment they had not to do that. They knew that the monies they paid every year went to reduce licences in their own districts, and to a certain extent they got compensation, because the trade was supposed to improve in that district by the licences being extinguished; but it would not be so in this case. The compensation levy had to be levied over the whole of England and Wales at the same rate, to be paid into one fund, to be under the absolute discretion of the Star Chamber of Three sitting in London, who knew nothing about the circumstances of the district. That was very different now when Quarter Sessions and the local justices knew what the districts required. The Prime Minister had said he would place on the Paper either on Clause 7 or Clause 24 some Amendments to meet the case of the new licences granted under the Act of 1904. He did not see any such Amendment as that which had been mentioned on the Paper. Clause 7 would be reached on Wednesday, and therefore, the Amendment should be put on the Paper this evening. This clause would apply to the new licences granted under the Act of 1904 which would be included under the regular statute. He wished to remind the Committee what a very strong case these new licences had. A letter from the managing director of a large brewery company had been placed in his hands. The writer said—

“I should be much obliged if you could tell me how the Government proposes to treat licensees who obtained their licences under the 1904 Act. My company paid £8,000 only last autumn. I have seen the Solicitor-General, and his reply was that the authorities have no right to value on a ninety-nine years' lease, the licence being annual. But they have stuck to the £8,000.”

There were 164 cases in which capital sums had been paid down and accepted as monopoly value, and all these new licences would be caught by this clause. These sums had been accepted because the licence had been regarded as a continuing property. There could be no stronger argument than the case of the general belief in the continuity of licences in the eyes not only of the magistrates, but also of the trade and the general public. Under the Act of 1904 justices, brewers, and other people had paid these sums for licences because they all regarded them as a continuing property. A man would not have paid £6,000 down last autumn if he thought his property was going to be confiscated. He urged that whatever happened to other on-licences, these new licences granted under the Act of 1904 ought, at all events, to be excepted from reduction under the clause.

Question proposed, “ That subsection 1 stand part of the clause.”

THE SOLICITOR-GENERAL (Sir S. EVANS, Glamorganshire, Mid.) said the hon. Member had referred to cases in which the magistrates had levied a lump sum for monopoly value. That was a matter which was receiving the attention of the Government, but obviously the place to deal with it was on Clause 24, which would not be reached this week. Such cases were not included in this clause for any practical purposes. They were post-1904 licences and were not subject to compensation at all. The whole question raised by the Amendment was whether or not the number of licences to be reduced as fixed by the schedule was the minimum number or ought to be the maximum. The policy of the Government was that it was to be the minimum, and that if in any case the justices came to the conclusion that the circumstances of the locality would justify further reduction, they could reduce further subject to this, that if the reduction was in the number of licences which would be entitled to compensation, the discretion of the justices was fettered by the amount of money in their hands. The policy of the Government was to give discretion, subject to financial considerations, to make further reductions over and above the reduction made compulsory under Section 1.

SIR E. CARSON (Dublin University) complained that whenever the Opposition raised a point which was perfectly germane to the section under consideration they were told they ought to wait until they came to some other clause. If they pointed out that it was impossible to deal with a point without knowing what the intentions of the Government were, they were always told that if they waited for some other clause they would see an Amendment. That was an unreasonable and impossible way to carry on business. It was bad enough for the trade to know that so many thousands of houses were to be taken away every year, but were the Government going to add to the uncertainty by saying there were so many more thousands to be taken away? In every one of these matters the Government were proceeding absolutely in the dark. Whenever they were asked for information on any point they had none to give. They talked glibly about the power of companies to put by sinking funds, but when they asked for the figures the Government refused them. They knew perfectly well that that argument on the figures necessary for the sinking fund was based upon the majority behind the Government. When they asked for some calculation as to what sum would be available under certain circumstances for the extinguishing of those licences the reply of the Government was: “ We do not know anything about it, and how can we give the figures? ” If the Government compared their methods of compensation with that adopted under the Act of 1904 they could get at an approximate figure. They would not, however, do this, and they referred to leave the House without any information, and anything seemed to be good enough when they had the guillotine. That was the way they argued, and it did not matter whether there were 100 public-houses here or there. When the Government were asked for information about this clause their reply was that they had no information whatsoever to give. How did the financial provisions, as they affected this clause, stand? The compensation levy, as he gathered from the Bill, was TELLERS FOR THE AYES—Mr.

 Joseph Pease and Master of

where licences were abolished because they were not required. Thus, in Northumberland, which had one licenced house to every 500 of its population, practically no reduction would be made under the compulsory clause, but the money taken from that county would go to compensate for the reduction of houses in Cambridgeshire where the proportion was one licensed house to 133 of the population, and that notwithstanding the fact that the convictions for drunkenness in Northumberland averaged one for every sixty-two of the population, while in the county of Cambridge the proportion was one to 333. They were going to take away money from a county where there was a great proportion of drunkenness to compensate for the abolition of houses in a county which had nearly the least proportion of convictions for drunkenness. This clause intensified the injustice done by Clause 1, and its absurdities were even greater than those of the first clause of the Bill. He submitted that the Government ought to stop at the reduction which was outlined in introducing the Bill, and not attempt by this side wind in Clause 12 to introduce this further reduction compulsorily. [An HON. MEMBER: "Not compulsorily."] It was compulsorily. He did not think hon. Gentlemen had noticed the words in Clause 12. Once the justices in any part of the country proposed a further reduction, then if the Commission had money enough to pay compensation, the reduction would be made and it must be passed by the Commission. [An HON. MEMBER: Hear, hear.] That was his argument. It was compulsory on the Commission. [An HON. MEMBER: Not on the justices.] No; he should be astonished to find that there was not in any part of the country a bench of magistrates which would propose a further optional reduction on the lines of this clause, and, if so, the compulsion was sure to become operative. The effect of the clause was that if in any county or parish, although not being in Wales, the justices desired to introduce total prohibition during the reduction period, and if they put their case before the Licensing Commission and there was money enough, the Commission must pass it, so that indirectly they were introducing popular prohibition. He could not conceive that the proposal in the Bill had been fully considered by those who framed it.

MR. JAMES HOPE (Sheffield, Central) said the Solicitor-General had entirely failed to meet the contention of his hon. colleague. The contention was that under the financial proposals of the Bill there would be a substantial balance in the hands of the Licensing Commission. Did he understand the Solicitor-General to admit that there would be this large balance or not? Had he worked out the proposal? Those who had approached the matter from the Opposition point of view had worked it out to the best of their ability, and they said that there would be. There was a probability that there would be a large balance. Apparently the Solicitor-General was in doubt as to the effect of the proposal. Assuming that there was a large balance, how was the Licensing Commission to deal with it? Apparently under the subsection of Clause 12, to which his hon. and learned friend had referred, they would be obliged under local veto to comply with the demands for further reduction, amounting perhaps to total prohibition, if there were funds in hand. Were the Commissioners to satisfy the demand of each bench of licensing magistrates in the order in which the demand was received, or would they wait until they had reports from every county? On what principle would they act in the financial arrangements between one locality and another? What was the operation of Clause 9? Would Wales have priority? He was not at all sure that they ought. They had heard that the county which the hon. and learned Solicitor-General represented was the most drunken in Wales, that there the proportion of convictions for drunkenness was greatest. Supposing that a proposal for a reduction came from Glamorganshire, would that be binding on the local licensing magistrates? Whether the bench had been sufficiently strengthened under the present Government he had not inquired. At any rate, would it be mandatory on them to put forward a scheme for further reduction? Under this scheme would they have a priority over the other recommendations in England or other parts of Wales which were not supported by local option? He asked the Government on what scheme they could justify the taking of the compensation levy, say in Sussex or Sheffield, for the reduction of licences in this one specially inebriate county of Glamorgan?

MR. CHARLES ROBERTS (Lincoln) thought that the power of optional reduction was an extremely valuable one to retain in the hands of the local licensing justices. For the justices to have an additional power of control would be as valuable as the reduction itself. It was not so much the quantum of the reduction as the power of control that was desirable, and that power should be in the hands of the local justices. The hon. and learned Member for Kingston had told them that in Northumberland there were very few licences in proportion to population, and that yet there was a very high record of drunkenness, and he compared that county with Cambridge. But he thought that any one who looked at the matter would see that there were differences between the two counties. In the one there was a scattered population, engaged in agriculture, drinking beer, and in the other there was a mining community with higher wages drinking spirits. It was said that the fund should not be spent in a district where the compensation levy was not made; but it made no difference to licence-holders whether the levy was spent thirty or forty miles away, or 300 miles away. Even at the present time compensation funds raised in one district were spent in another, and no further injustice would be done under this Bill than under the Act of 1904. He did not admit that it was an injustice, for after all the legislation was for the benefit of the nation as a whole, and the funds should be raised by a national levy.

*MR. G. D. FABER (York) said it was rather amusing to hear the changes in the cries of the supporters of the Bill. In the afternoon the cry was: "Great is local option and the right of the people to over-ride the justices." That evening it was: "Great are the licensing justices with unfettered discretion." The day after to-morrow it would be: "Great is the Licensing Commission, for they are to over-ride everybody." All that proved the unreality of the Bill. The main purpose of the debate that night was to trot out the licensing justices and belittle Quarter Sessions. It had been said that the clause had been framed that it would operate in favour of giving elasticity to the discretion of the local licensing justices; but the elasticity worked only in one direction. If they were going to give the justices power optionally to reduce or to increase the licences then there would be something in the argument for elasticity. What the hon. Member imagined to be elasticity was only power of compression. He should regard this clause with the greatest possible concern and alarm were it not for the financial limitation proposed in Clause 12. He admitted that subsection (3) of that clause screwed down the power of the justices to a certain extent. It said that optional reduction could not go on unless the compensation levy was sufficient to meet it. But under Schedule 2 the rate of levy was so high, and under Clause 10 the compensation was so ludicrously low, that there might be a very large surplus after the compensation provided for under this clause was paid.

There was great force in the question of his hon. friend the Member for Sheffield: "Who is going to have the preference?" Perhaps if the Solicitor-General had any say in the matter, gallant little Wales would come in, for Wales under Clause 9 of the Bill was to have the out and out power, not only of statutory reduction, but of doing away with licences altogether. Much money would be wanted for that purpose, and the Solicitor-General would be neither more nor less than himself if he failed to put forward the claims of Wales before those of any other section. He did not know whether the commissioners would contain within themselves all the elements of prescience and wisdom, but they would have a very difficult task to perform.

Whether any of these points had been thought out by the Government he did not know, but he rather doubted it, as they were going on from day to day in a haphazard manner, and what was done one day was undone the next. No doubt the worse the predicament which the Government got into with regard to the Bill the better for those who said it was a bad Bill—badly thought out, a Bill which did not tend to temperance, or anything else worth having by the people of this country. He hoped the Government would give them some serious reason for having brought in this clause at all. He ventured to think it was a mere figure head only intended to enable the Government to say to those who supported the plenary power of the licensing justices: "See what we did for you under Clause 4. We have given you these extraordinary powers." The clause only illustrated the fact that the Bill was a jumble of incongruities and impossibilities in favour of which the Government had not been able to produce any argument.

MR. JOHN WARD (Stoke-on-Trent) said there was one point upon which he could heartily agree with the hon. Member for York, and that was that the debate on this point to-night was an absolute farce. That was perfectly true. The method in which the subject had been dealt with and the lackadaisical manner in which he approached the subject plainly showed that the discussion was more for the purpose of sheer obstruction than for elucidating the particular clause under discussion. They were given to understand that hon. Gentlemen were very much interested in the discretion of the magistrates, and they protested that under certain circumstances they would have no option. He was rather afraid that at present that was much the position of affairs. He for the first time attended a private meeting of the Petty Sessions at Wandsworth, and when the Minutes were read, the first Minute on the book read out by the chairman was to the effect that Petty Sessions had reported some sixteen licences which they thought were redundant and useless. Everybody agreed that the houses ought to be closed, but the Compensation Committee of Justices of the County of London had reported that Petty Sessions must grant eleven of these licences, as there were sufficient funds to deal with only five of them. He had hopes that some day a different power for the reduction of licences would be required, and under those circumstances he could quite understand how all temperance reformers were giving their most united support to this Bill. There might be points upon which they differed with regard to its application, but so far as its general principle was concerned, and the general principle of this main clause, they entirely agreed with it. He hoped they would have power given to the Licensing Commission to borrow money to make loans in order to provide for the rapid extinction of licences by optional reduction, and thus enable the Petty Sessions in many cases to make proposals for reduction far in excess and much more rapidly than was suggested by the schedule of the Bill. He could quite understand those who opposed the Bill saying that everything had been done that could be done by grandmotherly legislation to improve the position of affairs. He could quite understand that it was their business to obstruct this Bill in every way that they could, and if he held their opinions he should do the same; but the way in which they were endeavouring by mock heroics to convince the outside world that they were really debating the subject and wished for information was one of the most grotesque things he had seen for some time. They might convince themselves—he supposed people could convince themselves that they really did believe a thing—but he felt certain that they would not succeed in convincing anyone else that they were honest, especially in the obstructive tactics that had been adopted that evening. He gave the Bill what little support he could as he thought it was a step in the right direction. It was the first opportunity he had had of saying anything during the whole of the discussion, and in reference to this section also he gave it his hearty support.

MR. AKERS-DOUGLAS (Kent, St. Augustine's) said he had sat through most of the debate as a silent spectator, and had had as much opportunity of not to be in proportion to the number of houses to be statutorily reduced. They could fix the maximum under this Bill, but that might not be required for the purposes of the statutory reduction at all, and it might be put there to accumulate a fund to take away extra houses. Surely before they passed a provision of that kind giving this power of taxation to the licensing justices, and giving these extra powers to the Licensing Commission which was to sit in London and have jurisdiction over the whole country, they ought to know something of the amount that would be required. Surely they ought to have some estimate made by the Government of the amount of money required for that purpose. They were being asked to pass this clause absolutely blindfolded, without knowing a single one of the elements that would enable them to come to any conclusion as to whether they ought to allow the clause to pass. The House had been told earlier by the First Commissioner of Works that he did not know the meaning of his own Amendment; now they learned that the Government had made no attempt to ascertain the financial effects of its scheme. So the matter went on, and the only answer that the Opposition could get from the Government was: "Don't you bother; we have got our majority, and it is only the licensed trade with which we are dealing."

*MR. CAVE (Surrey, Kingston) said that hitherto the clause had been dealt with as being optional in character, but if it were read in conjunction with Clause 12 it would be seen not to be so. Together the clauses meant that if, after payment had been made for licensed houses abolished under the scheme for statutory reduction, a balance remained in hand, that balance must be applied to a further reduction in the number of houses. The result would be that instead of 30,000 licensed houses being abolished, as calculated by the Prime Minister, the number might be 40,000 or 50,000. The Bill instead of reducing licences by one-third would have the effect of reducing them compulsorily by a very much larger number. That was the effect of the Bill, whatever might be the intention of the Government. That being so, he submitted that the Committee were entitled to know what amount was expected to be available for this purpose. If the balance must be applied to a further reduction, they ought to know what the balance was expected to be and how many more houses were expected to be abolished during the reduction period. The Prime Minister had given an estimate, but he was pointing out that the number would in all probability be greatly increased. The giving of that indication might involve a calculation of what was the average amount to be paid for each house. He submitted that the calculation ought to be made. The scale under the Bill was a reduction on the old scale, the reduced sum amounting, some said, to a fourth, a sixth, a tenth, or a fifteenth of the amount payable under the Act of 1904. Figures had been given in support of that view, and no answer had been given by the other side. It seemed to him to be vital that they should have some material to enable them to judge the average amount of compensation under the Bill, the amount that would be available for compensation, and as a consequence the amount that must be applied under this clause for further reduction. The clause brought under the operation of this unfair scale a large number of houses. If a further reduction were to be made under the old system, it would not be so serious, but the effect was to bring under a grossly unjust scale a very much larger number of houses. The effect of the lower scale would be that a number of the houses suppressed would get nothing at all, or practically nothing in the way of compensation. Therefore, the clause in effect had for its purpose the putting of grave injustice on a number of holders. Another point was that not only under the statutory reduction was one part of the country to pay for another, but that was so also under this scale of optional reduction. In counties where an effort had been made—and there were many such—to keep the number of houses within limits which were thought to be required by the population, a levy would still be made on the remaining houses and a certain amount of that sum would go to compensate houses in another county or perhaps at the other end of the country before him. He held that the words "compulsory reduction" were a misuse of the phrase in the sub-clause. The reduction was not compulsory, but purely discretionary in the local justices. What was compulsory, no doubt, was that after that discretion had been exercised by the justices, and they had determined what was called in the sub-clause "optional reduction," then, if there was a sufficient amount of money in the hands of the Licensing Commission—having regard not only to the claims made upon them, but to claims in the future—they were to give the necessary money towards carrying out the reduction. Surely it was better, after they had made a right rule to some extent, to be able to say that that rule in certain cases could be relaxed. If that were so, what better could they do than allow the local justices to determine the matter themselves? As to the question whether Wales was specially favoured, that could be discussed at the proper time. Of course, there would be nothing in the nature of priority. The Licensing Commission would have to take the general view all over the country, and although it was impossible to state the amount they hoped and believed that the Commission would have at their disposal some funds which would enable the optional reduction spoken of in this clause to be effected. As to the injustice of taking money out of one county and compensating in another, the fund under this Bill was a national fund. Under the Act of 1904 it was a county fund, and had to be so administered; but, although they had been long accustomed to the division into counties there was no particular charm in the division into counties for this purpose. It made very little difference whether money taken from one corner of a large county like Glamorganshire or some of the divisions of Yorkshire was used for compensating a licence-holder in the opposite corner, or whether it was used for compensation in another county. The position of the Government was that this was not the money of the publican at all. It was in the nature of taxation, and everybody knew that the trade had been able to stand the levy made under the Act of 1904, and would be able to stand the levy made upon it after this Bill became law. It was money in the nature of taxation, and was properly regarded as national money, and it would have to go into the national Exchequer. It had been said in the course of debate that the number of convictions for drunkenness in Glamorganshire was very large. That was true. But it must be remembered that the population of Glamorganshire was of a most varied character. There were men there from all parts of the world, and in the great industrial centres no doubt a good deal more drinking took place than one liked to see. But the number of convictions for drunkenness was not necessarily a test of the amount of drink consumed. He knew that in Glamorgan it was due not to the drunken habits of the people, but to the vigilance and activity of both police and magistrates.

SIR F. BANBURY (City of London) said everybody was quite certain that the hon. and learned Gentleman would treat them with every courtesy and consideration, and the Committee were always glad to listen to him, because he always put his case in a clear and lucid manner. The reason why the hon. and learned Gentleman's answers were not satisfactory was not the want of clearness or lucidity, but because he had a bad case, in consequence of which even a gentleman of the hon. and learned Gentleman's great powers was unable to give satisfactory answers to questions put to him. When the hon. Member for Sheffield brought forward his Amendment, he referred to Clause 24, and the hon. and learned Gentleman remarked that the proper occasion to discuss Clause 24 was when that clause was arrived at. He noticed from the table of time allotted to the discussion of this Bill that the clause was to be discussed on the fifteenth allotted day, and that on that day there were fifteen clauses to be discussed. There were, no doubt, persons who desired to create some alteration in a trade which had been carried on for many years in this country under the auspices of the State. They desired to make a great reduction in the number of licences. The Prime Minister had said that one-third of the licences were going to be taken away in fourteen years.

Supposing the hon. Member for Lincoln was the owner of a public-house. He would naturally be interested in this Bill, and having read the speech of the Prime Minister and found that the licences were to be reduced by one-third in fourteen years, he would read the speeches of great advocates of temperance, like the right hon. Member for the Spens Valley, and find that according to them in those fourteen years he would be able, by good business-like discretion, to put by a sufficient sum to recoup him for the loss of his licence at the end of fourteen years. He would further read the speech of the hon. Member for Crewe, and would find that owing to the one-third reduction the remaining licensed houses would do considerably more trade, and that he would also be recouped in that way. He was at a loss to comprehend why hon. Gentlemen, whose pretension was that the Bill was going to promote temperance, cheered the sentiment that it would not promote temperance, but would allow the same amount of drinking to continue as in the past. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Lincoln would, of course, respectably conduct his house. He would read the debate and find to his horror—

*THE DEPUTY-CHAIRMAN (Mr. CALDWELL): Order, order. The hon. Member is not addressing himself to the Amendment.

SIR F. BANBURY said he would like most respectfully to point out that the subsection provided for an increase on the statutory number of reductions. It had been generally understood in the country that the reductions amounted to one-third, and it was only by reading the debates and going through the Bill carefully that one came across this subsection, which went further than the statement of the Prime Minister.

THE DEPUTY-CHAIRMAN said the impression made on the country was not the matter under discussion. The Amendment dealt with the optional reduction as contained in the clause and not with what the country believed to be the reduction.

Sir F. Banbury.

SIR F. BANBURY said that he was pointing out that, unless the Amendment stood, the statement of the Prime Minister would be incorrect, though, of course, he would not say he intended it to be so, and the number of reductions would not be one-third but a very much larger number, because optional power would be given to the magistrates to increase the reductions beyond that amount. The Solicitor-General had instanced his own county of Glamorgan, where, he said, the justices were an efficient body of people to whom this optional power could be well entrusted. That would have been all very well if it had not been for the enforced reduction of one-third. If that were not in the Bill, he should have no objection to giving the justices discretion to reduce licences where they were not required, subject, of course, to certain restrictions. He quite agreed that in the majority of cases magistrates were to be trusted; but they had to look at every circumstance, and there were benches composed of gentlemen who were of advanced temperance opinion, and if they saw in the Bill a clause to this effect, they must ask why the optional power was given. The House of Commons, they would say, was a sensible body which legislated reasonably and did not put a clause into an Act unless it was desired that that clause should have some effect. If this optional clause, therefore, was put into the Bill, many would say that Parliament desired that they should reduce the number of licences far beyond the statutory reductions. Hon. Members said there was no harm in that, because compensation would be granted. It had, however, to be remembered that it was always held out to people who owned licences that they would be able to compensate themselves because they would have an extended time. There would not be the extended time to the extent that the optional clause was put into operation. The question had arisen as to whether there would or would not be sufficient money to compensate for licences extinguished under the optional clause, and it had been pointed out that there was the safeguard that the justices could not extinguish licences unless the new Commissioners, the Star Chamber, had the money for compensation. It had been asked where they were to get the money, and it had been said that there ought to be an abundance of it. That, however, could only be so if the compensation given to the one-third were less than it ought to be. There was an incentive to the Government to put in a clause of this kind, because then, if they reduced the compensation far beyond the proper amount, they would have more money available to provide for the optional reduction of licences. The Solicitor-General at the close of his speech made a remark which he did not understand. He said there was no hardship in this, because it was not their own money. He alluded to a statement made by the hon. Member for Sheffield and said it was not the publican's money. Might he ask the hon. and learned Gentleman this question: With whose money did he pay his taxes? His right hon. friend suggested his clients'. He did not agree. Although it was once his clients', he had earned it, and it was his property. It was the same with the publican. He had earned the money and earned it in a business authorised by Parliament for generations. He failed, therefore, to see how the hon. and learned Gentleman's remarks were relevant. The hon. Gentleman had not a good case and was unable to sustain the attack. He was therefore obliged to commit himself to a statement scarcely worthy of his great reputation. He hoped the Government before refusing the Amendment, would pause and consider whether they had not gone far enough in providing for a reduction of one-third without giving this additional power to the licensing justices.

MR. RICHARDSON (Nottingham, S.) said that, as one who took a living interest in local life and who moved in and out among the people in his own city, he believed that this Bill would do as much good in the interests of real social reform and temperance as any measure that had been passed by this very progressive Parliament. He was specially delighted with this particular clause, and he hoped the Government would stand by it. He had the unenviable reputation of having lived in the famous Market Ward, Nottingham, which was mentioned by the Prime Minister, during the whole of his working life. If the universal and uniform principle of the reduction of licences was applied there—it was a ward with 1,400 voters and seventy-nine licensed houses—sixty-nine out of the seventy-nine would be closed during the reduction period of fourteen years. He had found out how often the greatest number of licensed houses in proportion to population were to be found in the most congested areas of a town where the poorest people lived. He had in his city a singular exemplification of that where this optional principle should be applied. They had one ward, which was in the most ancient part of the city, and where the poorest people lived. He would not mention it. They had immediately running side by side with that ward a new ward, part of the city where building operations had been going on for the last fifteen years at a very rapid rate. In that new ward the temperance sentiment was very strong, and the result was that they had prevented many licensed houses being planted there. That was a ward in which they could afford to leave a good proportion of the licensed houses remaining during the next fourteen years, but the other ward where the number of licensed houses was greatest in proportion to population was the one which he should like to be dealt with, to have the number of houses reduced in proportion to population. For this reason, he hoped the optional principle would be applied. What about the case he mentioned last week in which they had a village just outside Nottingham with a population of 11,000 people and only one licensed house? That was the "Trent Bridge Inn" connected with the cricket ground. How were they going to apply the universal rule there? Would they do away with that house altogether? He supported the clause.

EARL WINTERTON said the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down had, although he did not intend it, given strong evidence in support of the contention that the clause should not be passed. The hon. Member began by referring to the famous Market Ward of Nottingham. His observations regarding that ward should have been made on the clause dealing with statutory reductions. He also went on to speak of some other ward near the Trent Bridge judging as the hon. Member for Stoke, and he did not think that the charges the hon. Member had made were in any way justified by the facts. The debate of that afternoon was of very great importance, and if arguments were pressed and repeated it was because the Government gave no answers to their pertinent and direct questions. Again, with regard to the debate which had taken place in the last hour, his hon. friend the Member for Sheffield and his hon. friend the Member for York had addressed certain pertinent questions to the Solicitor-General, but they had had no reply to them. He appealed to the two hon. Gentlemen whom he saw opposite to him, both of whom were noted in the House for their courtesy and lucidity of argument, to answer two or three questions which had been addressed to them. His hon. friend especially wanted to know whether the compensation money was to be reduced, and if so, to what amount? He did not know whether it was true that the Government had made no calculation in this respect, but he should imagine that there were certain materials available. But perhaps one of the two hon. Gentlemen would tell them whether they had any figures, or say that they did not think it necessary to make any valuation. Then his hon. friend put another pertinent question, which hon. Gentlemen opposite might think it worth while to answer. For his part he thought it would be an interesting answer if they could get it. It was why, if the compensation money was to be reduced, ought not the levy to be reduced at the same time? Then, again, they would like to know what was the estimated amount available for compensation. That was a point of principle which was extremely ably put by his hon. friend the Member for Sheffield. They had no time in which unduly to prolong the debate, and though they could not blame the Government for taking means so that their divisions should be taken with great regularity at certain hours, it was for them to say which point they preferred to discuss, and if they discussed it at greater length than some hon. Members thought reasonable he could honestly assure them it was because they were not satisfied with the answers they had received. The hon. Member for Lincoln said he valued this optional reduction, and that they having complained in the past that under this Bill they were to be governed by absolutely cast-iron rules as to the number of licences, he should have thought they would have welcomed this optional power which was given to the licensing justices. But this optional power was very much like the so-called local option which the Government proposed under this Bill. They trusted the magistrates in so far as there was local veto or local prohibition, but they did not give the absolute, fair, and open option to the magistrates to say whether there were sufficient licences in the district or whether it was necessary to bring them to a higher level. For himself he thought this clause was quite unnecessary. The Act of 1904 in his opinion was working extremely well, a satisfactory reduction of licences was being made all over the country, and this was being done without any hardship falling upon those who had an interest in the licences. So far as he was concerned, therefore, he objected even to the statutory reduction laid down in the other part of the Bill, and they looked upon this clause as an extra hardship seeing that a further reduction beyond that laid down by the Act might be made, and it was not in the power of the justices to say whether the reductions already made were not too great. He agreed with his hon. friend and therefore differed from the hon. and learned Gentleman as to the justice of taking money levied in one district for the purpose of paying compensation in another. It was certainly regarded as a hardship by the trade. He would not labour the point, as neither he nor his hon. friends desired unduly to protract these proceedings. He thought, therefore, if the hon. and learned Gentleman could reassure the Committee upon the three or four points that had been put to him the progress of the debate would be much accelerated.

SIR S. EVANS said he could not complain of the progress of the debate so far as it had gone, but he had thought it more convenient to speak immediately after the mover of the Amendment, at which time these points were not

*MR. CLAVELL SALTER (Hants, Basingstoke) said the hon. Member for Stoke had intervened just now for the purpose mainly, as far as he could gather, of informing the Committee that the debate had degenerated into a farce and that obstruction was being practised, although the Solicitor-General expressly repudiated any such charge against the Opposition. The hon. Member, as he was good enough to tell them, had not previously given them the benefit of his assistance in those debates, but no sooner did the discussion degenerate into a farce than he considered it the proper moment to speak. Although not in the sense in which the hon. Member used the word, there was a good deal of farce about the prolonged debate in which they were now engaged and in which they were doomed to be engaged for so many more days. There was an air of unreality about the whole debate, which he believed was profoundly impressing the people. He opposed the sub-section against which the Amendment was directed, on the short and single ground that it was a crying example of that inconsistency and irresolution which had marked the whole structure and conduct of the Bill. Someone must decide how many licensed-houses there should be in a district. They might leave that to various authorities, they might enact it themselves, or they might leave it to the locality and allow the justices or Quarter Sessions or the general body of the people themselves to represent the public opinion. Again, they might lay down their rule in Parliament and allow local modifications. But, in the name of all that was consistent, if they had local modifications and if they trusted the locality at all, they ought to trust it altogether. Parliament began by laying down a certain ratio to density of population as being the proper number of public-houses within the area. Either that was right or it was wrong. If it was right, if they were confident in their opinion, why did they allow any local interference with the ratio they had laid down. If they thought it right to allow a great voice to local opinion and local discretion, then they must in consistency, so far as that local voice was allowed to interfere, allow it to interfere freely in any direction it desired. To his mind it was a matter of comparative unimportance whether it was the justices, or Quarter Sessions, or the people who were to revise and modify the ratio which was laid down. But the Government did not trust the justices except in one direction; they did not trust Quarter Sessions, because they were to be deprived of the power the last Act gave them; and they did not trust the people, for in England the people might forbid, but might not demand; while in Wales they were allowed to accelerate but not to retard the process of reduction. What the Bill did in this subsection, was to give power to those local people whose views agreed with those of the promoters of this Bill, while they deprived of power those who differed from them. They gave power to a temperance bench, while giving no such power to the bench which had an opposite view. It had fallen to his lot to appear before a bench of licensing justices, and a fairly numerous bench, every member of which sat on the bench with the blue ribbon of pronounced temperance in his button-hole. That was the kind of bench which was given carte blanche, but a bench of a somewhat different view was not trusted and was given no discretion at all. And there was no safeguard in regard to expense, because by the simple expedient of giving to dispossessed persons, roughly speaking, one-eighth of that which justice and equity required they hoped to have a good surplus for optional reduction. Nor was there the safeguard of the Act of 1904 that those who desired to be virtuous should pay for it themselves. This Bill invited cheap virtue and cheap temperance; it invited areas to be exceedingly virtuous at the expense of the publicans among their neighbours. If they were going to allow any local interference with the ratio which Parliament had laid down, whatever authority they might choose to represent the people, they ought, in justice and consistency to allow that authority to exercise that discretion in one direction as well as in the other.

MR. GRETTON (Rutland) said the Government had not given the slightest indication to the Committee as to how they expected the financial proposals to work out. He could not confess that he was ignorant of that subject, because he had discussed it with many persons who were used to discussing Bills produced by teetotal enthusiasts and Radical Governments. They had tried to extract information as to how these financial proposals would work out in relation to optional reduction. The compensation to be paid under the compensation clauses would be very much lower than the compensation paid under the Act of 1904. That compensation, as years went on, would be paid upon a diminishing scale. What did the Government expect would be done by the Licensing Commission and the magistrates in relation to the compensation levy? This was germane to the whole subject of the surplus which would be available for optional reduction. There was nothing to fix the exact scale of charges which was to be determined by the Licensing Commission and graduated according to the schedule. What were the Government going to do? Were they going to accelerate the rate of reduction and carry out their statutory scale at an earlier period? There was nothing to prevent them doing that. At the end of the period they could go on charging their scale of levies, and so accumulate considerable surplus funds. There was nothing in the Bill to prevent the scale of charges and the powers under this clause being so worked that a very much larger number of licences might be got rid of in the fourteen years. If the compensation was as low as many hon. Gentlemen opposite desired, and the levy was kept at a sufficiently high point, they might get rid of the whole of the licences during the reduction period. Was that the intention of the Government? There was no appeal under the terms of this clause to Quarter Sessions.

*THE CHAIRMAN: I do not think that question arises on this clause.

MR. GRETTON said this was a very important question—

*THE CHAIRMAN: It is not a question of its importance, but whether it arises on subsection 1.

MR. GRETTON said this subsection in regard to optional reduction was most vague. They had been placed under the greatest difficulty in discussing it, and no hon. Member opposite could explain what it meant, or how it would work out. The only conclusion it was possible to come to was that this clause had been drawn up on the advice of some right hon. Gentleman not present, and in his absence there was no one to explain it.

Question put.

TELLERS FOR THE NOES—Sir
 Alexander Acland-Hood and Mr. Forster.

*MR. CAVE moved to insert, before the word "extinguish" the words "refer or," with the object of retaining the system created by the Act of 1904, under which licences, instead of being refused or dealt with by petty sessions were referred to Quarter Sessions to be dealt with. Nobody who was familiar with the operation of the Act of 1904 would deny that it had worked extremely well. Under that Act each bench in a county considered the requirements of its own district, and having decided that certain licences were unnecessary, they were referred to Quarter Sessions to be dealt with. Quarter Sessions reviewed the whole county, and they dealt with the licences, taking into consideration those which could be dispensed with and the means at their disposal. The Act had been fully used. Speaking with some years experience of the operation of that Act and as chairman of the licensing committee in his county and of Quarter Sessions, he said most emphatically that all the licences which were really unnecessary or harmful could be dealt with under the Act within a very moderate period, without dislocating the trade of the country or reducing the present scale of compensation. He did not know whether hon. Members had seen the report presented to the Quarter Sessional divisions of Lancashire by the clerk of the peace for that county. The county licensing committees obtained from all the Petty Sessions returns of the licences which they thought ought to be suppressed, and made an estimate of the amount required fully to compensate the owners of those licences. They estimated that, in a period of fifteen years, with the use of the Act of 1904, they would be able to deal with all the needless licences on the footing of compensating every person interested. He deeply regretted that within so short a period an Act which had been shown to be a useful and beneficial Act and productive of temperance should, in effect, be repealed by this Bill. Those who had taken a practical and active interest in the question of temperance, chairmen of Quarter Sessions, justices, and others, would all say that by the simple operation of the Act of 1904 every real grievance and danger in the matter of an excess of public-houses could be dealt with without any real loss to, or deprivation of the rights of, persons interested. The effect of the Amendment, if accepted, would be to keep alive that statute. Hon. Gentlemen opposite were rather disposed to deal with the question of the reduction of houses as if the Act of 1904 had not been passed. No doubt there was a minority in the last Parliament who objected to that Act and rightly fought it to the end, but once passed, it was an Act of Parliament, and he did not remember a case of an Act of first class importance which had created substantial interests being reversed by a subsequent Act without provision being made for the protection of those interests. Vested interests in the right to compensation were created by the Act of 1904, and according to the traditions of Parliament, whatever new legislation was passed on the subject, they ought to protect these interests. He could not make that statement more clearly than it was made by the present Lord Chancellor. During the passage through this House of the Bill of 1904 the Lord Chancellor, then Sir Robert Reid, said:—

“Parliament could repeal this Act (1904) in case it became law. But . . . there would be a legal fixity of tenure recognised in the eyes of the law in every public-house in the country, and they could not try the experiment of local option without buying out every single one of the public-houses in the local option district at an inflated price enhanced by the fixity of tenure created by this Bill. . . . This Bill was for all time, if anything in human affairs could be for all time. This fixity of tenure would be as fixed and certain and protracted a tenure as any of them might have in land.”

Now, on that principle, to every interest created by the Act of 1904, fair protection ought to be given. The clause which they were now discussing was more drastic than the Act of 1904, because it enabled justices to suppress licences by the grant of very inadequate compensation. He maintained that the matter was of so great importance to individuals that it ought not to be dealt with by the justices upon the local benches of small districts, but by the Court of Quarter Sessions of the whole county. The Bill proposed, however, to abolish all reference or right of appeal to Quarter Sessions; except that in so far as optional reduction beyond the statutory limit was concerned a right of appeal was reserved. It was on these grounds, and because of the great importance of the question that he begged to move his Amendment.

Amendment proposed—

“In page 3, line 25, after the word ‘to,’ to insert the words ‘refer or.’”—(Mr. Cave.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there inserted.”

SIR S. EVANS said that the hon. and learned Gentleman under what appeared to be a very simple Amendment had delivered to the Committee an elaborate argument on the Act of 1904 and the interests created by it. He was not going to be tempted by the hon. and learned Gentleman into any discussion on that subject. The Committee were engaged in altering the Act of 1904 in some particulars; and were following some of the principles established under that Act for the first time. With regard to the hon. and learned Gentleman's particular Amendment he would like to call the attention of the Committee to what would be the operation of it if carried. The hon. and learned Gentleman told the Committee that he proposed to retain the old practice and procedure established under the Act of 1904, merely in regard to statutory reduction. Now, the Committee had dealt with the statutory reduction in the first part of the Bill, and they had imposed upon the local justices the duty of carrying out that statutory reduction; or, in other words, to reduce the number of licences by about 30,000 within fourteen years. What the hon. and learned Gentleman desired to do was to have a different procedure adopted in regard to any further optional reduction. He was certain that the Committee would come to the conclusion that if the local justices were the proper tribunal to deal with statutory reductions under Clause 1, there should be the same procedure under the same authority in dealing with optional reductions under Clause 4. It was sometimes forgotten that the local benches and the Court of Quarter Sessions were different bodies of men. There was a reason for giving Courts of Quarter Sessions a right to deal with the cases in which compensation was refused under the Act of 1904. The fund from which the compensation was to be given was a county fund, to be administered by the Court of Quarter Sessions, and it was right to give the county some control over the licences which were to be taken away. That reason would no longer exist under this clause, for the fund would be a central fund for the whole of England and Wales, and there was no reason arising out of the character of the fund for dispossessing the local justices of the power of dealing with the matter, and compelling the reference to Quarter Sessions of optional reductions of licences. The Committee had already determined the body which should deal with statutory reductions, and it would not be prudent to have a separate tribunal and a separate procedure in dealing with optional reductions of licences. The Government could not accept the Amendment.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said there was one thing that could not be denied, viz., that the point raised by his hon. and learned friend was of very great importance and interest, and he could not but regret that a Cabinet Council was now going on which entirely prevented the Committee from having the assistance of any Cabinet Minister at all, or indeed of any Member of the Government concerned with the construction and drafting of the Bill. The speech of the hon. and learned Solicitor-General was a speech of ability. He had not a word to say against him, or against the courtesy he had displayed on this and on other occasions. But that was not the question. On this occasion he maintained there ought to be some Cabinet Minister present, perhaps not during the dinner hour, which he admitted was a painful necessity, but they had long passed that hour, they had been for some time in the full swing of the debate, and he did say that it would be proper for some Member of the Cabinet to be present during the discussion. Very much slighter omissions were severely noticed in the last Parliament. He admitted the enormous strain of legislation and administration for ten months in the year on Ministers, but he thought that was not an adequate excuse for leaving the front bench utterly unadorned by the presence of any right hon. Gentleman belonging to the higher grade in the Ministerial hierarchy. The hon. and learned Gentleman who had just sat down resisted what he called the temptation of replying to the arguments of his hon. and learned friend the Member for Kingston, backed up as these arguments were by the authority of the present Lord Chancellor. He thought that that was one of those exhibitions of virtue which were extremely easy to display. There were certain temptations which the weakest amongst them must sometimes resist. The temptation to answer an argument to which you can see no reply was one of those temptations resistance to which made virtue easy, and that virtue the hon. and learned Gentleman had been able to practise that night in a manner which would excite the admiration of and satisfy the Nonconformist conscience. Passing from that, he thought that the argument of the Solicitor-General was singularly weak. It amounted to this: that one system had been already established under Clause 1 for dealing with statutory licences and that it would be exceedingly inconvenient and undesirable to have a parallel and contemporaneous system for dealing with licences which were outside the legal limit, and which under the Bill might be also diminished. But the Government loved these duplications, the whole Bill was full of them. They had two systems of local option; they had magistrates and the parish both dealing with the question of new licences; and he could not conceive whence this horror of doubling the machinery arose in the hon. and learned Gentleman's breast. The truth was that although his hon. friend's Amendment would be a much better Amendment if the rules of the House enabled them to give it a large extension, there was no reason whatever against their giving it such extension as they could on the present occasion. Evidently the Government were not content with destroying what the present Lord Chancellor said were sacred, viz., such rights as were created by the Act of 1904, but they went further and went beyond those substantial interests. Their aversion to that Act was so great that they desired to pull down those portions of it which, so far as he could discover, it would have done them no harm to keep. His hon. friend had a large acquaintance with the actual working of the Act of 1904. He was himself a chairman of Quarter Sessions, and had the minutest and most constant knowledge of what went on in regard to the machinery, especially of the Act of 1904, and when he came down and told the House that the machinery had worked perfectly during the three years in which it had been tried, that it had given contentment both to the magistrates who constituted what might be called the Court of First Instance, and also to the Court of Quarter Sessions, who might be described as a Court of Review, it was perfectly unintelligible why the Government should come forward and destroy a mechanism which had, unlike the mechanism which they proposed in this Bill, been shown by the test of experience to be a good working machine. There could be no reason for destroying it. On the contrary, by the arbitrary, cast-iron and extremely foolish rule which they had chosen to establish in Clause 1, they had made it quite certain that there would be an immense reduction of licences, whether that reduction was desirable in the interests of the locality or not. Under this clause they made it possible to have still further reductions. Those reductions might inflict great hardship upon the locality in which they occurred. Why should there not be some reference to the Court of Quarter Sessions, that had done its duty so well in the past as a Court of Appeal? The argument seemed to be conclusive, but, conclusive or not, it had not been replied to by the hon. and learned Gentleman who had just sat down. Under those circumstances, if his hon. friend went to a division he should certainly support him.

*THE UNDER-SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. HERBERT SAMUEL, Yorkshire, Cleveland) said that he could not for a moment pretend that an Under-Secretary was to be regarded either as useful or ornamental. But he protested against the assertion of the right hon. Gentleman that that bench had been left untenanted by any member of the Government who was concerned with the preparation and drafting of the Bill, for both his hon. and learned friend the Solicitor-General and himself had had that privilege. He could not assent to the assertion that this Amendment raised a question of large or grave importance. It by no means concerned the virtues or vices in general of the Act of 1904, but raised a question of very minute importance. There were three conditions under which a licence might be refused by the licensing justices. In the first place, there were the cases of misconduct or structural insufficiency. In that case the licences were not referred to Quarter Sessions, and they would not be referred to Quarter Sessions under this Bill. There was an appeal to Quarter Sessions at the present time, and there would be an appeal to Quarter Sessions under this Bill. In the second place, a licensee might be refused a renewal as part of the statutory reduction. That point was not raised by this Amendment, which only dealt with the part of the clause now under discussion, which was optional and additional reduction. Obviously, the powers of Quarter Sessions, under the Act of 1904 did not arise on this Amendment, so far as the refusal of the licence was part of the scheme of statutory reduction. This Amendment only touched the class of cases where licences were refused in the discretion of the justices over and above licences which they were to refuse under Clause 1, and all this clause did was to say that these licences should no longer go before Quarter Sessions as an administrative body by reference, but might come before Quarter Sessions as a judicial body on appeal. That was the whole difference between the law as it would stand and the law as it stood under the Act of 1904. It was not necessary to refer every licence to Quarter Sessions. Quarter Sessions were no longer concerned in the fund from which these licensees were to be compensated, but the Government agreed that there was a case for Quarter Sessions having a right to review if persons chose to come to them on appeal, and that was provided for in the second subsection of this clause by the words "subject to the foregoing provision." That said that—

"The licensing justices shall have the same powers and discretion (subject to the like appeal) as to refusing the renewal or transfer of an old 'on-licence' as they have for the time being with respect to other on-licences."

That was to say, they had the same power as to the renewal or transfer of the pre-1904 licence as they had in regard to the post-1904 licence.

SIR E. CARSON wished to point out in regard to the words "subject to the foregoing provision," that the foregoing provision was that the licensing justices had to do this and not Quarter Sessions.

*MR. HERBERT SAMUEL said the "foregoing provision" was that they had to obtain the consent of the Licensing Commission. Obviously that was so, and if hon. Members would look through the clause carefully, they would see that it was. They could not effect these additional reductions save in accordance with the "financial provisions of this Act," and it was subject to that "foregoing provision" that they were to take action, and the appeal was preserved. It was clearly stated in the subsection: "Subject to the like appeal." The right hon. Gentleman might interpret the words "subject to the like appeal" to be not subject to the like appeal, and he would have displayed the most remarkable ingenuity, but it was the intention of the subsection to preserve the same appeal as existed before 1904 as to the renewal of the licence. He thought that intention was carried out.

SIR E. CARSON said he had not the least desire to enter into a legal argument with the hon. Gentleman the Under-Secretary, though he wished to state his views. It was not the first time that the hon. Gentleman had laid down emphatic law which had been proved, upon reference to previous Acts, to have been entirely erroneous, and if he might be so audacious as to give the hon. Member a little advice, he would counsel him in the construction of an Act of Parliament to be not always so absolutely certain as he appeared to be.

MR. HERBERT SAMUEL: I was, of course, not acting upon my own opinion, but upon advice.

SIR E. CARSON said the hon. Member must not think for a moment that by merely raising a laugh on the wording of a clause he could construe an Act of Parliament. He dared say hon. Members thought his opinion was not worth much, and he did not quarrel with them in regard to the manner in which they appraised his legal opinion, but he never stated a legal opinion in this House which he did not conscientiously believe was the true construction of the particular matter which he was putting before the House. After all, the hon. Gentleman said they intended a certain thing.

Well, he hoped they would put their intentions down, and that when they did so and they came to ask them about the matter they would be able to explain them. He also hoped hon. Gentleman would understand them, though it was not their experience during the Bill that they did, but it might be so, as the Bill went on. The hon. Gentleman said that this appeal was preserved. What did the section say?

"The obligation under this Act to carry out the statutory reduction shall not affect the power of the licensing justices to extinguish licences in any rural parish or urban area in excess of the number for the time being required to be extinguished under this scheme for statutory reduction, subject, in the case of the proposed extinction of an old on-licence involving the payment of compensation, to the financial provisions of this Act; and that power is in this Act referred to as 'the power of optional reduction.'"

In the case of statutory reduction was there any appeal? ["No."] And except under this Bill the licensing justices had no power to extinguish, while Quarter Sessions would have the power to extinguish under the Act of 1904. Where did the hon. Gentleman get the appeal? The hon. Member said it was in the second subsection in the words "subject to the like appeal." Yes, but that was subject to the foregoing provision, which said that the licensing justices should have the same power with regard to excess licences, and those which the statutory provision applied to. To his mind, as a lawyer, the matter was absolutely plain, but the Solicitor-General would probably give them some reason for dissenting. If he and the Solicitor-General disagreed they made it plain, and his challenge to the Government was to make it plain, and that would put an end to the whole matter. Might he also remind the Committee that the argument put forward by the Under-Secretary was entirely different from that put forward by the Solicitor-General, who argued that no appeal was necessary, because there was no appeal under the Act of 1904. [The Solicitor-General dissented.] That was the way he took it.

SIR S. EVANS said he certainly did not intend to say that, and he did not think he did say it.

SIR E. CARSON said he certainly took down the words: "There is no appeal under the Act of 1904." Of course there was not, because the matter went to Quarter Sessions on a reference. Why did the hon. and learned Gentleman enter into a learned disquisition as to the reasons why, under the Act of 1904, it went to Quarter Sessions? What was the necessity for that if they were not taking away the jurisdiction? He said the reason was because the fund was distributed by Quarter Sessions. What was the necessity of this if they were not taking away the jurisdiction of Quarter Sessions? The truth of the matter was that there was an attempt in this section and in the next subsection to get rid of Quarter Sessions. That was the object of the Government. The Government were prepared to maintain the appeal in the case of a licence extinguished on account of misconduct, but would give no appeal where the licence had been taken away and the man had conducted his house well. The reason for that was that they did not trust Quarter Sessions, and because they knew that the Quarter Sessions who were removed from local prejudice of a particular district had refused to lend themselves to the practices that had prevailed in certain Petty Sessions. The Under-Secretary for the Home Department had said that this matter had no relation to the Act of 1904. Was that so? Was there no argument to be found in the fact that they were bringing in extra provisions, outside altogether the statutory reduction, to compel further reductions, although the Opposition were able to point out that the Act of 1904 had been only touched the class of cases where licences were refused in the discretion of the justices over and above licences which they were to refuse under Clause 1, and all this clause did was to say that these licences should no longer go before Quarter Sessions as an administrative body by reference, but might come before Quarter Sessions as a judicial body on appeal. That was the whole difference between the law as it would stand and the law as it stood under the Act of 1904. It was not necessary to refer every licence to Quarter Sessions. Quarter Sessions were no longer concerned in the fund from which these licensees were to be compensated, but the Government agreed that there was a case for Quarter Sessions having a right to review if persons chose to come to them on appeal, and that was provided for in the second subsection of this clause by the words "subject to the foregoing provision." That said that—

"The licensing justices shall have the same powers and discretion (subject to the like appeal) as to refusing the renewal or transfer of an old 'on-licence' as they have for the time being with respect to other on-licences."

That was to say, they had the same power as to the renewal or transfer of the pre-1904 licence as they had in regard to the post-1904 licence.

SIR E. CARSON wished to point out in regard to the words "subject to the foregoing provision," that the foregoing provision was that the licensing justices had to do this and not Quarter Sessions.

*MR. HERBERT SAMUEL said the "foregoing provision" was that they had to obtain the consent of the Licensing Commission. Obviously that was so, and if hon. Members would look through the clause carefully, they would see that it was. They could not effect these additional reductions save in accordance with the "financial provisions of this Act," and it was to that "foregoing provision" that they were to take action, and the law was preserved. It was clearly in the subsection: "Subject to the like appeal." The right hon. Member might interpret the words "subject to the like appeal" to be not subject to the like appeal, and he would have been the most remarkable ingenuit. It was the intention of the subsection to preserve the same appeal as before 1904 as to the renewal of a licence. He thought that intention was carried out.

SIR E. CARSON said he had the least desire to enter into an argument with the hon. Gentleman the Under-Secretary, though he wished to state his views. It was not the time that the hon. Gentleman had laid down emphatic law which had proved, upon reference to previous Acts, to have been entirely erroneous. If he might be so audacious as to give the hon. THE CONDITION OF IRELAND.

THE MARQUESS OF LONDONDERRY: My Lords, I rise to call attention to the lawless condition of certain parts of Ireland, and to ask His Majesty's Government whether there has been an increase in intimidation, boycotting, cattle-driving and offences against property and individuals in those districts during the current year; and whether the law as administered has been found adequate to deal with the existing state of affairs and, if not, what steps the Government propose to take with a view to protecting the liberty and property of individuals.

Your Lordships will remember that I have brought this subject before the notice of the House on more than one occasion. On the first occasion the disorder was but as a small cloud no bigger than a man's hand, but the misgivings I then expressed have, unfortunately, been since realised; and this lawless condition of affairs, owing to the action of His Majesty's Government in not checking it in its origin, has now spread over a certain number of counties in Ireland. Indeed this entire disregard of the law has extended to almost within eighteen miles of Dublin. When I drew the attention of His Majesty's Government to this matter, and warned them as to what would take place, the noble Earl who now leads the House denied that the Government—

“Had any intention of doing anything but dealing in the fullest manner with such disorder.”

And the noble Marquess whose absence we so much regret (Lord Ripon), who then led the House, declared that the Government—

Now, are His Majesty's Government to-night prepared to repeat their declaration that the ordinary law is sufficient to check the disorder?

It will be observed that I have restricted my Question to certain parts of Ireland, to the parts which are at the present moment in a lawless condition, and to those districts I shall entirely confine my remarks to-night, because I rejoice to think that outside eight counties the ordinary law of the land is recognised and respected. Hitherto when attention has been called to the serious condition of certain parts of Ireland it has been the custom of His Majesty's Government to slide off into an entirely different channel, and instead of giving a direct reply they have endeavoured to prove that ordinary crime in Ireland was no worse, and perhaps less, than in England. Therefore I ask the noble Lord who will reply to me on behalf of the Government to confine himself to replying to my Question.

I do not think that His Majesty's Government will deny that at the present moment this lawlessness exists in no less than eight counties in Ireland. It was, therefore, with some surprise that I read a speech delivered at Liverpool on 8th October, by the Attorney-General for Ireland, who said that we were at the “Beginning of an era of peace, concord, and prosperity in Ireland.”

I do not hesitate to say that I rubbed my eyes with astonishment when I read that statement coming from a prominent member of the Irish Executive, and I hope there will be some explanation of how such a statement can be reconciled with the actual facts. The Government have themselves recognised in some degree the actual state of affairs, for they have issued a certain kind of proclamation enabling them to introduce extra police into disturbed districts. That was one reason why I rubbed my eyes with astonishment at reading the Attorney-General's statement. I find that the charges of the Judges of assize are at complete variance with the statement made by the Attorney-General. I do not propose to weary your Lordships by quoting more than a few of the charges. Mr. Justice Kenny, at the Galway Assizes on 20th July, said—

Mr. Justice Madden, at the Longford Assizes on 3rd July, referred to the condition of things as—

At the Roscommon Assizes on 10th July, Mr. Justice Kenny said—

I have other extracts of a similar kind, but I think those I have quoted will be sufficient to prove that the condition of these parts of Ireland has been declared by the Judges to be unsatisfactory and deplorable.

The actual returns of outrages confirm these statements. Persons under police control on 31st January, 1906, were 41; on 30th September, 1908, they numbered 104. Under patrol protection on 31st January, 1906, there were 167; on 30th September, 1908, 252. Cases of wholly boycotting on 31st January, 1907, were 14; on 31st August, 1908, 75. Cases of partial boycotting on 31st January, 1907, were 38; on 31st August, 1908, they were 40; and minor cases had increased from 164 to 639.

Then I come to another very dangerous class of crime, which appears as far as I can see, not to disturb the authorities at all—what is known as firing at persons. In 1906 there were three cases of firing at persons, and up to 30th September there had been ten such cases in 1908. Firing into dwellings during the same periods had increased from nine to fifty-five. Agrarian outrages numbered 234 in 1906, and were 418 to 30th September, 1908. Cattle-drives in 1907 numbered 381, and in 1908 up to June there were 413. The awards for malicious injury in the six months from April to September, 1906, amounted to £372; and the amount from October to March, 1908, was £2,912. These figures are of so remarkable a character that I think it must strike your Lordships as extraordinary that the Attorney-General for Ireland should endeavour to lead the people of England to believe that we are at the beginning of an era of peace, concord, and prosperity. I maintain that the statement of the Attorney-General is entirely misleading and absolutely contrary to the facts.

I now come to the second part of my Question. I ask the Government whether the law as administered has been found adequate to deal with the existing state of affairs. Again, I turn, in the first place, to the charges of the Judges. Mr. Justice Kenny, at the Roscommon Assizes, said—

and Mr. Justice Ross, at the Lard Judges Court said—

“This leniency is now interpreted as imbecility, cowardice, and connivance.”

Judge Curran, at Longford on 15th June, declared that—

“Cattle-driving will never cease as long as the Government only binds to the peace.”

That is the opinion of His Majesty's Judges, and I ask His Majesty's Government whether it is their intention to allow this state of lawlessness, which I have shown is on the increase, to go on absolutely unchecked, certainly unpunished. Why will not the Government take proper steps to secure respect for the law, and to put an end to the present condition of lawlessness? I should like an answer to that question.

The Attorney-General for Ireland, in the same speech at Liverpool, said—

“The Liberal view was to associate the people with the administration of criminal law in such a way as to make them feel they were responsible for the welfare and good order of their own country. In this way the Liberal Party believed they would really gain to their side the whole mass of the people, making them feel that the law was their friend."

Surely the way to associate the people with the law and order is through trial by jury. But what has become of trial by jury in Ireland? The Government have virtually admitted that trial by jury is an absolute failure. The law officers have told you that they have had plenty of evidence but could not get juries to convict the cattle-drivers, so great was the intimidation. Accordingly the offenders are brought before the magistrates, who simply bind them to the peace. Therefore I repeat that the Government have virtually acknowledged that trial by jury is an absolute farce.

What steps do His Majesty's Government propose to take to remedy the present serious state of affairs? It is not for me to advise His Majesty's Government; but I would suggest that there is a very simple course before them, and that is to make use of the statutory powers they at present possess. Without the need of reviving the Crimes Act, which the Government seem so much to dread, cattle-drivers could be tried under the existing statutory law for riotous assembly before two resident magistrates and summarily convicted. It may be said, in the interests of the law breakers, "Oh, but they would receive a severer punishment." So much the better. Law breakers ought to be punished. I regret the absence to-day of the noble and learned Lord the Lord-Chancellor, as I should like to have appealed to him on this point. I am confident that if cattle-driving took place in this country the authors of it would be prosecuted for riotous assembly, and they would be liable to two years' imprisonment. If that is the case in England, why, I ask, are these law breakers in Ireland, who are equally guilty, to be let off by being bound to the peace, which the Judges tell you is a complete farce? I hope I shall have an answer to that question.

I leave the question of cattle-driving and turn to that of boycotting. Boycotting, as the figure I have quoted so tragically show, is rampant in those parts of the country which I have referred to and which, in my mind, is a disgrace to those responsible for the administration of the law in Ireland. We had difficulties with regard to boycotting at the time I undertook the Lord-Lieutenancy of Ireland, but by the administration of the Act of 1887, we entirely stamped it out. Why cannot that be done now? I noticed that Mr. T. W. Russell in a speech the other day asked—

"How can the Crimes Act stop boycotting?"

I shall show you very shortly that when the Crimes Act was administered by a strong Government, who recognised their responsibilities, boycotting was very soon stopped. But I will answer the Nationalist Mr. T. W. Russell, in the words of the Unionist Mr. T. W. Russell, who, speaking in the House of Commons on 21st August, 1889, as to the effects of the Crimes Act, two years after it had been in operation, said—

"In October, 1887, the number of persons boycotted was—in Clare, 506; and in Kerry, 477; and on July 1 this year there were seven persons in Clare and thirteen in Kerry, wholly or partially boycotted. Now, if that does not indicate an improved condition of things, I do not know what would be called an improvement. . . . Now, if I take the whole country apart from these two counties, I find the facts showing an equal improvement."

Mr. Jackson, who succeeded Mr. Balfour as Chief Secretary, and to whom the restoration of law and order was due, speaking in March, 1892, said—

"In 1888, according to a Parliamentary Paper presented to the House, there were on 31st July, 1887, totally boycotted people in Ireland to the number of 870, and partially boycotted, 3,965. On 31st December, 1891, there was not a single person in Ireland boycotted, either wholly or partially."

These are two conclusive testimonies of the success of the Crimes Act in stopping boycotting, yet Mr. Russell asks how the Crimes Act could stop boycotting. I know full well that there are considerable difficulties in dealing with very subtle cases of boycotting in Ireland. My own experience, and I was in the thick of it, demonstrated to me how difficult it was to deal with a certain mischievous class of boycotting; but in those days the Government recognised their responsibilities, and were determined that the law of the land should be effectively administered. I will give your Lordships a concrete instance of a case that occurred during the time I was Lord-Lieutenant. Certain men were prosecuted, and there was a great deal of comment at the time because it was stated that they were being proceeded against for simply winking. It sounded a very trivial thing to be prosecuted for, but I will explain what that winking meant. There were a certain number of farmers on one of the campaign estates who were the victims of a ring of boycotters, and the general evidence was that they were systematically pursued by persons who gave this signal to intending purchasers, thereby rendering it absolutely impossible for them to sell their cattle or produce. Well, we prosecuted the boycotters, and our action resulted in a conviction and a smart sentence. The consequence was that the whole conspiracy collapsed, and these men were allowed to live in peace under the protection of the law. If boycotting in the shape of winking can be effectively dealt with under the Crimes Act I fail to see why, if you put it in force, you could not do away altogether with the present lawlessness.

When I have previously drawn attention to boycotting in your Lordships' House I have been told that the important cases were very small in number, that the cases enumerated were minor cases, and that, therefore, it was not worth while reviving the Act of 1887. To the uninitiated in England a minor case of boycotting may seem a trivial matter. Let me quote a definition given by the Lord Chief Justice, who, at the Spring Assizes for County Clare, held at Ennis on 3rd March, last, said—

"Let them take an instance of those so-called minor cases. . . . He would take the case of a man named Taylor. People did not speak to him or deal with him in any way, and he had to go to Limerick for all the necessaries of life. . . . There were five cases where people did not speak or deal with the parties, and they had to go considerable distances for the necessaries of life. These were instances of minor boycotting."

Will any one tell me that cases of boycotting ought not to be taken notice of because they are minor cases only, when this intolerable treatment is meted out to the victims?

When I last raised this question the Lord Chancellor said that the Crimes Act—

"Would only inflame ill-feeling, and increase the volume of crime."

The Marquess of Londonderry.

I was surprised at that statement. If the noble and learned Lord studied the Irish papers as closely as I do, he would find that when men were prosecuted and, refusing to be bound over, went to gaol, they caused quite as much ill-feeling as would result from putting in force the Crimes Act. Again, I cannot reconcile the statement of the Lord Chancellor with the fact that when the Act was put in force by a Unionist Government the volume of boycotting was reduced. What has gone far to increase the volume of crime in Ireland is the action of His Majesty's Government and the statements which have been made by Ministers. I remember well that when Sir Edward Carson called upon the Chief Secretary last summer to take advantage of the law that existed or could be revived, Mr. Birrell replied—

"I will not."

I submit that that word did more to increase the volume of crime than anything that had been done for some time, and it carried joy to the hearts of the law-breakers. I hope the Government, though rather late in the day, are realising the seriousness of the present state of affairs and will take steps to put an end to it. I have noticed that Mr. Birrell has never spoken very strongly of the disorderly conduct of certain parts of Ireland. He certainly said once that his fingers itched to prosecute the cattle-drivers or those who promoted cattle-driving, but his hands never grasped the offenders.

The land settlement in Ireland is being suspended because the agreements for sale which have been signed are not being carried out. I maintain that Mr. Birrell cannot ride on two horses; he cannot say that the disorderly condition of Ireland is stopping the progress of land settlement, and yet at the same time take no steps to put an end to that disorder. When the last Unionist Government, of which I was a member, passed the Land Purchase Act, we never anticipated that it would be such a glorious success. It is now Mr. Birrell's duty to quell the present disorder and go on with the land policy, for in allowing lawlessness to continue, the Government are doing serious damage to the industrial prosperity of Ireland owing to the great charges that are placed on localities for extra police.

On this occasion we have an advantage which we have not had before. We have now present with us Lord MacDonnell, who has been created a Member of your Lordships' House since we last debated this subject. Lord MacDonnell had been in Dublin while the serious increase of crime was going on. Of Lord MacDonnell I speak in terms of sincere respect. His friends have told me that he is a man of great ability, and a staunch supporter of law and order. With regard to the first description, I most cordially concur, and with regard to the second, I should like to hear his speech to-night before I form an opinion. Lord MacDonnell occupied the great position of permanent Under-Secretary at Dublin, and in that capacity he naturally had a large voice in the conduct of affairs. Doubtless he will tell us his experiences there at that time, and whether he concurred in the action of his Chief in permitting this lawlessness to go on.

I have frequently been told that the condition of Ireland is not nearly so bad as it was in the dark days before the Act of 1887, when crime and outrage stalked unchecked. I fully admit that. But there exists in Ireland at present a state of demoralisation of those who are responsible for the administration of the law. There is demoralisation from the highest to the lowest. The Judges know it is no use charging juries, and benches of magistrates dare not sit for fear of the consequences. Their lives would be in jeopardy if they gave decisions contrary to the will of the United Irish League. The police themselves are in doubt when they are doing their utmost to maintain law and order as to whether they will be supported by their chiefs. Surely a state of demoralisation such as this is a scandal to a civilised country and ought not to be allowed to exist. It is the custom for English people to say: "Oh, it is only Ireland"; but I maintain that the life and property and comfort of Irishmen, no matter how humble, have a right to be protected. As the spirit of lawlessness is spreading in Ireland, so will it spread over the whole of the United Kingdom, and it is because I believe it to be to the interest of England as much as of Ireland that law and order should be maintained by those responsible for it that I have put down the Question which stands in my name.

*LORD CLONBROCK: My Lords, I wish to support most strongly what has fallen from my noble friend who has just sat down as to the condition of a very considerable part of Ireland. I can assure the House that deep anxiety exists in Ireland both as regards the present time and as to what may happen in the immediate future, because we have it on very high authority that there is to be a renewal of agitation during this coming winter. As my noble friend has pointed out, eight counties out of the thirty-two are concerned. That is not only a quarter of the number of counties but it approaches very nearly to a quarter of the whole area of Ireland. A quarter of the whole area of Ireland is a little over 8,130 square miles; the area of these eight counties is 7,912, and we have seen in the public Press that the agitation is extending further south and east into the county of Tipperary.

The Government are evidently well aware of the increasing amount of agitation, as we see from the step, about the only step they have taken, in the direction of increasing the police force in these several counties. In the half year ended 31st March, 1907, the amount charged to the counties for extra police was £799; on 31st March of this year the amount was £7,073. That shows the opinion of His Majesty's Government as to the requirements of the country in the way of police in consequence of this agitation. I must point out that this is a very heavy burden upon these counties, and that it falls chiefly upon the people who are injured by these illegal acts and outrages. In speaking of the police, I wish again to bear testimony to their admirable conduct, to the energy and activity which they have displayed under very discouraging circumstances; for it must be most discouraging to them, after all the hard work that devolves upon them in endeavouring to check cattle-driving and other outrages, to find that when they make an arrest the defendants are merely bound over to keep the peace. There are plenty more to take the place of the cattle-drivers who are bound over, and they are encouraged by the leniency shown with regard to this offence.

My noble friend has well described the state of terrorism which can be produced by fear of outrage and boycotting. Boycotting could not continue to any extent were it not for the terrorism which is inspired and the fear of violent outrages. In the first six months of this year there were seventy-five cases of firing into houses and at people; and only a few days ago I read that in my own county about twenty shots were fired into a house in which two ladies resided, and, as usual, no arrests were made. The system of terrorism is so great that orderly and law-abiding persons are debarred from following their ordinary avocations in life, and they look, as I say, with the greatest possible apprehension to the future. I do hope, therefore, that it is not too late to urge His Majesty's Government to give up vague generalities, as to the state of Ireland being, on the whole, satisfactory, to consider how large the disturbed area has become, and to extend to peaceable, law-abiding citizens that protection which they have a right to expect in any civilised country.

*LORD DENMAN: My Lords, once more we are embarked on a debate dealing with the question of law and order in Ireland, and once more the attack on the Government has been led by two noble Lords well qualified by their position to speak for the landlord party in that country. This is not the first time—no doubt it will not be the last time—that this question has been discussed in your Lordships' House during the life of the present Parliament. I notice that there is a certain similarity in the arguments and in the views which are put forward with those which have been put forward on previous occasions, and I think it possible that there may be a corresponding similarity in the answer which I have to give to-day.

The noble Marquess dealt at some length with statistics, and I shall have a word to say on that matter. Formerly, when I have taken part in these debates, I have endeavoured to ground my case a good deal on the figures supplied to us by the police. I have endeavoured to show that if the number of outrages and crimes was not much worse in a particular year, say in the year 1906, than in the previous year, the state of Ireland even in the disturbed districts could not be as very bad, and I have been rather surprised, I am bound to confess, at the ease with which the figures I have given have been brushed away by noble Lords opposite either suavely or brusquely or contemptuously, according to the disposition of the speaker. A noble Lord would get up from the front Opposition bench and say: "What do I care about your statistics. I much prefer relying upon the opinion of Mr. So-and-so"; and it is a curious thing that Mr. So-and-so's opinion always coincided with his own. Then some other noble Lord, say, for example, Lord Mayo, would rise from the benches opposite and say: "After all, the number of these outrages depends upon the way in which they are ordered to be reported by the police."

THE EARL OF MAYO: Hear, hear.

*LORD DENMAN: The noble Earl adheres to that statement. Well, that knocks the bottom out of my statistics altogether. The noble Marquess has grounded his case to-day on figures and answers which have been supplied, I presume, by the Irish Office in the House of Commons. After my experience of statistics I had not intended to ground my case upon them to-day. The noble Marquess, however, has dwelt at length upon the state of the country which obtained when he was Viceroy, when he was a member of a firm and courageous Government, and I would like to quote some figures which will give a comparison of the state of the country as it is to-day with the state of the country as it was during the last year of the noble Marquess's occupancy of the office of Lord-Lieutenant. That, I think, was the year 1889.

I find that the figures are as follows. In 1889 the cases of intimidation numbered 202; in 1908 they are 242. Offences against property were 132 in 1889; in 1908 they are 64. Offences against the person were 27 in 1889; in 1908 they are 18. Offences against the peace were 96; to-day they are 108—that is to say, we have a total of 432 cases to-day as against 457 when the noble Marquess resigned his office and at a time when the Crimes Act, to which the noble Marquess is so devoted, had been some two years in force. With regard to boycotting, I find that there were 53 serious cases in 1889; there were 26 in 1908. Therefore, I think we may conclude, if there is any force in the figures that I have given or that the noble Marquess has given, that the country is in no worse condition to-day than it was during the rule of the Government of which the noble Marquess was a member and after two years application of the Crimes Act.

I was glad to notice one rather important admission in the speech of the noble Marquess. He told us that outside eight or nine counties the ordinary law prevails. I thank the noble Marquess for that admission. That is a very distinct improvement upon the attitude which he took up in the debate at the beginning of this session. What did he tell us then? He said—

“To my mind, at the present moment the condition of Ireland is undoubtedly more serious than it has been during the past thirty or forty years.”

Now he tells us that outside eight or nine counties the ordinary law prevails, and that the condition of Ireland is, I presume, fairly satisfactory. Therefore, if we are to judge by this admission, the state of Ireland has certainly improved during the last few months.

I have said that I do not intend to rest my case to-day on figures, but I admit that importance should attach to these figures. I have said so before, and it would only be consistent on my part to say so again to-night; and if you judge by the figures I admit that certain counties in the west of Ireland are certainly in a bad condition to-day; indeed, I believe their condition is worse than at any time during which the present Government have been in office. But, having said this, I propose to dwell for a few moments upon the cause of the trouble, and I hope I shall be able to show that the state of things even in these districts is not really so bad as the admission I have just made would seem to imply. In the first place, as the noble Marquess and his colleague, Lord Clonbrock, I think, have admitted, the disturbance is confined within certain areas. County Clare, in which, I regret to say, the disturbance has lately spread and which is certainly one of the worst at the present time, is responsible for 149 out of 313 agrarian outrages and for 106 out of 536 cattle-drives. In other words, County Clare is responsible for half the outrages in the disturbed area and for one-third of the outrages in all Ireland; it is also responsible for half the threatening and intimidatory letters and notices. Of the other counties, Galway and Roscommon are the worst. As I have said, the trouble is confined within certain districts.

As regards the steps which have been taken to cope with the disorder in those parts of Ireland, nine counties have been proclaimed for the purpose of increasing the police establishments. An addition of 750 men has been made to the constabulary force. The police in these counties, under difficult conditions, have done their best to deal with the disorder that exists. Half the cost is borne by the counties proclaimed. Signs are not wanting that the local authorities are beginning to be concerned at the cost which they will have to meet for extra police, and it is to be hoped that they may bring their influence to bear in the cause of law and order.

To my mind there is one hopeful sign in the rather gloomy picture which the two noble Lords who have just spoken have drawn, and that is that we know, or at all events we believe we know, the cause of the disease. I believe it is generally agreed on both sides of the House that the cause of this disease is known, and once you know the cause surely it should not be entirely impossible to find a remedy, even though we may differ as to what that remedy should be. Of course the primary cause is congestion in the West of Ireland. You have poor people living in the neighbourhood of rich grazing lands which they covet for themselves, and, human nature being what it is, they have resorted to extremities in an entirely mistaken attempt to attain their ends. I do not wish for a moment to be thought to excuse or extenuate any of the crimes or outrages that have been committed in these districts. Nothing is further from my mind. Indeed, no language can be too strong to condemn them. But, at the same time, we know that this land hunger is a factor in the situation, and it is a factor which anyone attempting to deal with this problem will have to take into consideration.

There is, I think, a reason why the land hunger in the West of Ireland is worse perhaps than it is in other parts, and it is to be found in the Land Act of 1903. The Estates Commissioners have bought untenanted land in different parts of Ireland, but owing to the high price of grazing land in the west I believe it is true that a comparatively small number of properties have been acquired there compared with other parts. The consequence is that people in these districts have seen untenanted land change hands in other parts of Ireland but not in theirs, and as a result the disappointment in those particular districts has been deep and bitter. The Government intend to lay before Parliament during this session legislative proposals for dealing with the question of congestion and with the points raised in the Report of the Commission presided over by Lord Dudley, and of which the noble Lord behind me, Lord MacDonnell, was a distinguished member. Of course, it would be impossible that at this stage of the session any Bill dealing with a question of this magnitude should be expected to pass through either House of Parliament. That is out of the question, but I think it is possible that when the people realise that the Government are in earnest in grappling with this problem of congestion it may do something to allay the disorder even in the districts where it is at present most pronounced. Then the noble Marquess asks us what we are going to do; and from the terms of his speech I gather that what he wants us to do is to apply the Crimes Act.

THE MARQUESS OF LONDONDERRY:
Hear, hear.

Lord Denman.

LORD DENMAN: I have to tell the noble Marquess frankly that it is not the intention of the Government at the present time to apply the Crimes Act. They prefer to rely on the ordinary law, in the belief that their policy will result in the creation of a healthier state of public opinion, and that by refusing to resort to exceptional measures they will eventually enlist the sympathies of the people themselves on the side of law and order. If we want support for our policy of refusing to apply the Crimes Act to-day it is to be found in the weighty words which fell from the noble Earl, Lord Dudley, in a debate at the beginning of this session. And I would venture to remind the House that Lord Dudley was a member of the Tory Government, that he was himself responsible in part for the government of Ireland under a Tory Administration, and that if he were prejudiced it is not likely that he would be prejudiced in favour of the views which generally obtain on this side of the House. Lord Dudley, in the speech to which I have referred, described coercion as—

“A policy which cuts at the root of all true union between England and Ireland, and which embitters public opinion in that country to such an extent as to render successful government difficult, if not impossible.”

He said—

“It inevitably turns discontent into real disloyalty.”

And he went on to declare that—

If that is true of any Government, surely, my Lords, it is especially true of this Government, because the people of Ireland have been led to believe, by the utterances of leading members of the Liberal Party, that they will receive more sympathetic treatment than that which was accorded to them by their predecessors. Therefore, when the noble Marquess urges us to apply coercion in order to deal with the trouble in the disturbed districts, my answer is that it is not only a question of these particular districts. It is a question of whether you are to stir up this feeling in the country, whether you are to have war to the knife between the people and the Government of Ireland.

There is considered something rather fine and brave and courageous about a policy of coercion. Why, goodness knows! For, if you come to look into it, really exactly the opposite is the case. It may, perhaps, be easy to govern for a time if you choose to resort to methods such as these, and to my mind I am bound to say the reputation for courage which coercion carries with it would be a temptation to some men to apply it on a very slender pretext. Were I, by any horrible concatenation of circumstances, to be Chief Secretary for Ireland—and I can imagine no more terrible fate—I would certainly be tempted to yield to any pressure, however slight, to apply the Crimes Act in order to acquire a reputation for firmness and courage on such absurdly cheap and easy terms. We are urged to apply coercion and to crush down any threatened disorder by force, or, at any rate, by coercive means. Well, this may succeed for the moment, though even this, as I think is clear from the figures I quoted of the state of affairs after the noble Marquess himself had applied coercion for two years, is open to question; but you would inevitably increase tenfold the mistrust and the hatred which so many Irishmen feel to-day for English institutions and English forms of government.

If you only take thought for the present, what can be easier than for those charged with the duty of government to avail themselves of the weapons which a powerful country like ours places in their hands? Surely, my Lords, it is a far more courageous policy to look beyond the needs of the moment and to refuse to do anything which might intensify the bitterness of a people whose goodwill it is still possible you may gain, or which might, so to speak, have the effect of mortgaging the political future of the nation. Shrewd observers have given it as their opinion that before long in Ireland we shall come to a parting of the ways. Either we shall have to trust in the loyalty and the goodwill of the people of Ireland—and that there is not loyalty I, who have fought alongside Irish regiments in South Africa, refuse to believe—or we shall have to rely on government by force, which, if you are consistent, although the Government of Ireland never has been consistent, must inevitably result, as was pointed out in this House by the Lord-Chancellor, in Crown Colony Government.

I venture, with all possible respect to noble Lords opposite from Ireland, to take leave to doubt whether these debates, after all, serve any very useful purpose either in Ireland or in this country. I am quite sure of one thing—that by constant repetition of these things, by constantly raising these debates in your Lordships' House, by reports in the Press, sometimes, at all events, exaggerated, the people of this country are beginning to think that the description of a particular parish, or a particular district, or a particular county in a disturbed condition applies to the whole of Ireland. The other day I came across rather a striking instance of this. A lady living in the outskirts of Dublin was engaging an English governess, and a few days before the governess was due to go over to Dublin to take up her position in this lady's household she wrote a letter stating that she was extremely sorry she was unable to go after all, as her mother would not let her, because she feared that her life would not be safe. That is the kind of impression which these repeated debates and newspaper paragraphs will, I believe, give to the people in this country.

My Lords, I have no wish at all to minimise the disturbances in these counties in the West of Ireland, and I think that in the greater part certainly of Galway and Clare the property of the grazier, if you reckon cattle as being the bulk of his property, is certainly not as safe as it is in other parts of Ireland; and from our point of view one unfortunate aspect of the case is that these deliberate outrages and this criminal folly of cattle-driving will, if persisted in, alienate and exasperate public feeling in this country, and will set the tide of public opinion flowing against a policy of conciliation and sympathy, which I notice even such a stalwart Tory paper as the Morning Post recommends, and it is, of course, always possible that this Government may be driven to adopt the policy recommended by the noble Marquess.

It seems to me that you have to look at this question from a broad and wide aspect, for, in spite of all the things that have been quoted, Ireland at present is hopeful and is looking for the dawn of a better day. In other parts of the world, indeed, one might say all the world over, the claims of nationality and the demand for self-government are making themselves heard. In other countries, in our own Colonies, you applaud these things; you deem them fine and noble aspirations, and if it lies in your power you do what you can to assist in their realisation. But to Ireland, with all the bitter memories of the past still rankling in her mind—to Ireland, if we adopt your policy, we are in effect to say, "Let there be war, and war to the knife between the Government and the people," and all this in order to allay temporary disturbances and check local disorders, grave enough, I admit, in themselves, but symptoms, after all, of a still graver disease which only years of patient, sympathetic, and courageous treatment can ever hope to remedy or cure.

LORD ASHBOURNE: My Lords, I listened with close attention to the speech which has just been delivered by the noble Lord who represents the Irish Government, trusting that he might have been able to hold out some hope that the Government had realised at last that it was necessary to do something. That was not a very extravagant expectation, but what have we had? All that the noble Lord did was to express the hope that when the people of Ireland realised that the Government were in earnest—they appear not to have realised that up to the present—we might then expect to see some tremendous change. Then the noble Lord intimated that it would be an appalling thing to have war to the knife, and that the Government would not resort to a policy such as that, at all events for the present.

Now, what are the realities of the situation? Are we to lose sight of the speech of my noble friend the noble Marquess beside me? The noble Lord who has just sat down indicated a great desire to make a contrast between the state of the country in 1889 and in 1908, but that is not germane to the question. The contrast I would make is between the time the present Government came into office, three years ago, and the present moment. The question is, Why have the Government allowed the country to get into such a state; and what are they going to do? The noble Lord used the word coercion. It is a word that some people like to use as if it meant a great deal more than in substance anyone can ascribe to it. It is not suggested that all the clauses of the Act of 1887 should be applied. Attention has been drawn over and over again to one particular clause in that Act which enables two magistrates to deal with unlawful assembly and riot. If that clause had been applied, cattle-driving would have ceased in a week, and Ireland would now be absolutely quiet.

The contrast I make is between December, 1905, and the present time. Mr. Long was then Chief Secretary. He is the last man in the world who would seek to have praise given to him, but it cannot be denied that he proved himself a straightforward, manly English gentleman who knew his own mind and was direct in his purpose. When Mr. Long was in Ireland, law and order were held in respect. It was known that the people administering the Government would not tolerate disrespect of the law. When the Government of which the noble Lord is a member came into office it found Ireland comparatively quiet; there was no coercion that could be so-called; the clause of the Crimes Act to which I have referred was in occasional operation whenever needed; the police were not discontented; and all this was taking place at a time when there was no Irish Nationalist sympathy with the Government. We could not rely upon the popular sympathy which the present Government have done so much, they think, to enlist. But when I turn to the Irish Nationalist Press and read the reports of meetings that take place in Ireland, I do not find that the absence of anything effective to maintain law and order has won for the Government a single particle of popular esteem or sympathy.

Lord Denman.

No one can question the position in which the Government found Ireland when they came into office. Is not Mr. Bryce's testimony written large? Mr. Bryce's testimony before he went to America—he was, I have no doubt, very glad to go there, and I am not at all sure that Mr. Birrell would not like to follow him—was that when he came into office the condition of Ireland was satisfactory. Later on, when it came to Mr. Birrell's turn to raise his voice, he left Mr. Bryce nowhere. He said that Ireland had not been so peaceful, contented, and tranquil for 600 years. This was the testimony of your own Minister. I do not know a people in the world who can take the measure of a man quicker than the Irish; they know when they are face to face with a man who means to govern and knows how to govern, and when they are face to face with a man who cannot or will not govern. Therefore, after a time lawlessness naturally assumed a prominent position, and crimes, intimidation, and boycotting developed daily. Then came a new form of crime in the shape of cattle-driving, which advanced by leaps and bounds. If cattle-driving had been faced and met with resolute action in the first month of its existence it would have been promptly put down.

When attention was called to the matter in Parliament, Mr. Birrell said he would have nothing but the ordinary law. Give him time, he said, and he would be able to achieve the necessary result by the ordinary law. Abundant time has been given; the ordinary law has been tried and has failed, as everyone knew it would fail; jurors cannot be relied upon, and ordinary magistrates cannot adequately deal with the situation. The state of the country has become worse and worse, and there is a kind of paralysis in the administration of justice. Is this to go on for ever? Will not the Government try the section of the Act to which their attention has been drawn and which is known to be efficacious, instead of pottering with the ordinary law, which they know is inappropriate, and furbishing up Statutes of Edward III. and William IV.?

The noble Marquess has referred to the statements of Judges that binding to the peace is not efficacious, and it has been declared by one Judge to be an imposture. Surely this is a very serious state of facts, bearing in mind that it is not suggested by Lord Denman that it is intended to do anything more vigorous in the future than has been done in the past. Meanwhile open contempt of the law is expressed in Ireland and scorn for those who will not govern but leave matters to go on as at present. I read recently a statement by the Recorder of Galway, who, speaking with great knowledge on the subject, said it was impossible now to get process servers on account of the fact that men acting in this capacity carry their lives in their hands. That is the state of things we are asked to accept tranquilly whilst the Government are waiting to be thought by somebody to be earnest about something. Can your Lordships appreciate the state of things in some parts of Ireland? Have you ever tried to realise in your own minds what boycotting is? The victim is not allowed to be supplied with the necessaries of life, he is not to be spoken to by his neighbours, he is shunned in fair and market.

The noble Lord boasts that all Ireland is not in such a terrible state as the eight counties. Are not eight counties enough to be in the awful state that has been described? The other day I read of an application made to the vacation Judge sitting in Dublin that some other method should be adopted for serving writs as no process server could be found. The post was mentioned, but the postman's life would not be safe if it were known that his bag contained writs, and permission was sought to serve by posting in some public building in the locality. And this is going on within a few hours travel from London, and the Government have said nothing to indicate that they intend to grapple with and put an end to this scandalous state of things. Lord Denman referred to uneasiness about congestion. That will not do. Congestion is a word we are getting very familiar with. When we see the Report upon congestion we will deal with it in debate, and deal with it, I hope, adequately and efficiently. I will not now enter into any discussion of Lord Dudley's language. I had the responsibility of following him in the debate to which reference has been made, and I expressed my opinion with reference to his words then, though on consideration, I think I might have said more. What has been said on the subject of congestion does not meet the case. We are now dealing with cattle-driving and lawlessness. Meath was one of the quietest counties in Ireland; it was most sparsely peopled, it had splendid land, and was crimeless; yet under the beneficent sway of the Government who are always waiting for something to turn up it became, last year, one of the most lawless parts of Ireland without any congestion to rely upon for the scandalous and repeated cattle-drives that took place there.

I never enjoy figures, though I once had the honour of being connected as hon. secretary with a statistical society; but I will give one figure because it is very symptomatic. I read, a couple of days ago, an answer given in the House of Commons in which it was stated that from March to September, 1905, the awards for malicious injuries amounted to £506, whereas in the corresponding six months of this year, under the beneficent sway of the present Government, that sum had gone up to over £10,000. Can your Lordships conceive a more significant fact than that? Is it not also strange that while the Government are hoping everything and doing nothing the people who have not yet come to believe they are in earnest will not stay in the country? While in 1905, emigration reached the very large figure of 31,000, last year the figure had gone up to 39,000. The noble Lord said something about the police. The police in Ireland are a splendid body of men. I hope they will never have to lose confidence in the Government. It is they who ensure respect for the law. Let them feel that they can respect the Government. The result of waiting and doing nothing has been that lawlessness and outrage have increased, and the maintenance of the police cost an additional £47,000 last year. It is very expensive not doing the right thing. If the Executive had applied the one section of the Act of 1887 to which I have referred, much of that would have been saved and Ireland would be quiet.

Is it fair to keep Ireland seething in the present state of lawlessness? Has any Government a justification to keep it in that state when they have a remedy ready to their hand if they would but use it? The noble Lord said it was a sign of splendid courage not to use it. Many a man has been shot for such courage after a battle. It is said that it is no sign of courage to use the coercion Act. I do not say it is. I do not claim any praise for the Government of Mr. Long for using the clause I refer to, but every Government, I care not what it may call itself, should rise to the dignity of trying to do its duty, and the first duty of a Government is to maintain law and order. His Majesty's present Government have not done that. They have asked for time to try the Statutes of Edward III. and the ordinary law, and Ireland is now in the state which my noble friend has described.

It is never too late to mend. Although Ireland is, in many of its counties, in a bad state, I believe that if the remedy the Government have at hand were applied with nerve and energy peace and quiet would return, but the Government must realise that something has to be done and done at once. It will not do to tell us to wait for the debate on the Report as to congestion. It will not do to wait until the people find out that you are in earnest. It is necessary to act now if you want to cope with the disorders that exist. The Government have been looking on for a long time doing nothing. Do they not think that the time has arrived when they might cease talking of a future that may never come, and try to act in the living present to restore some respect for the administration of the law?

*LORD MACDONNELL OF SWINFORD: My Lords, I did not come down to the House this evening intending to take any part in the debate on the maintenance of order in Ireland, although it was my intention to ask your permission to make a few remarks on another aspect of the Irish question. But, responding to the invitation of the noble Marquess

I venture to say that I have listened to the debate with feelings of great depression. I listened to the impeachment of the noble Marquess and to the defence of the noble Lord, both of which were conducted with accustomed ability, and the impression left upon my mind was that the cause of good government in Ireland would be furthered neither by the impeachment nor by the defence. I know the West of Ireland well—I have recently had an opportunity of perfecting my knowledge regarding it—and I can assure your Lordships that the feelings which animate the people in that part of the country are due, not to any innate wickedness of their nature, or to disloyalty to the Crown, but entirely to the slow operations of land purchase, especially in regard to congestion.

As to the policy pursued by the Government in regard to crime in Ireland, I think that a sharper method of treatment for those who instigated cattle-driving would produce better results. But there may be doubt as to whether it is better to ignore men of that description, fanatics and instigators of misconduct, or to treat them sharply in the beginning and so suppress them. My own feeling leans to the latter method of treatment; but, whatever your Lordships' judgment on that question may be, I feel that it must be in any case a judgment on a side issue. The real issue which to my mind is raised by this debate is not whether cattle-driving or boycotting should be treated in one way or another, but how best to push on and complete the work of land purchase in Ireland. I firmly believe that in coercion you have no substitute for land purchase, and that in land purchase you have a complete remedy. Therefore is it not better and more statesmanlike and more profitable for the Empire, that, instead of wasting your time on such debates as these, you should endeavour to rescue the Government from the impasse to which they have come with regard to the provision of funds for land purchase? I came down to the House with the intention of making some observations on that subject. I do not know whether I should be in order now in pursuing my comments. If I am considered to be in order I propose doing so.

What is the present position of affairs in regard to land purchase? Briefly it is this: when the Act of 1903 was passed it was thought by the Government of the day that £100,000,000, with the grant of £12,000,000 as bonus, would suffice; but experience has shown that at least £150,000,000 will be required to complete the work, and the root difficulty at the present time is how this money should be provided. Up till now £25,000,000 in round numbers have been actually paid to landlords under the operation of the Act, leaving £125,000,000 still to be provided. Of that sum of £125,000,000—I speak in round figures, but I do not think I shall be out in any case more than a £1,000,000—agreements covering some £45,000,000 to £50,000,000 have been deposited with the Estates Commissioners. This question divides itself into two parts—first, how should those agreements be financed; and, secondly, how should the remaining £80,000,000 be provided. I will submit to the House my view with regard to each.

I presume that the agreements now deposited with the Estates Commissioners must be dealt with under the strict terms of the Act if the landlords, or the vendors, insist upon it; in other words, the money must be provided and cash paid unless the vendors agree to a variation of the contract. Assuming that no variation in the terms of the contract is agreed to, the difficulty is how to provide the cash. It is understood that by the end of this month a time will have arrived when a different course to that hitherto followed must be pursued in regard to land purchase finance. To the course to be followed later, I will presently refer. But limiting myself to the period before the 1st of November I think that if the balance of the bonus fund which, amounting to £4,000,000 or £5,000,000, would remain after the distribution on the Agreements now deposited had been made, is allocated for the flotation of loans, the Government will be able to pay off the £45,000,000 of deposited agreements, and to consider what new arrangements should be made to promote land purchase. The consideration of that problem should, I think, lead it to conclude that—after the 1st of November—it will be impossible to pay the landlords in cash. But if a scheme were devised under which a loan at 3 per cent. could be floated, which would stand at about par, the landlord could be paid in stock from which if he did not wish to keep the stock he might readily realise the price to which he was entitled for his land.

The floating of a loan at 3 per cent. would necessitate an additional charge upon the tenants; their annuity would be  $3\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. instead of  $3\frac{1}{4}$ . On the other hand, the probability is that the landlords would receive from one to two years purchase less than they had received hitherto; but I cannot regard that as a substantial hardship. It never was expected when the Land Act of 1903 was being framed that prices would go so high as they have. It was always thought that the average price would be about twenty-two years purchase, which, with the bonus, would be about twenty-five years purchase, a higher price for land than had been paid in Ireland theretofore. If this scheme is accepted the Government will be able to raise its loans with less or at very little less and pay the landlords a price of about twenty-five years purchase.

The only thing required to make the arrangement complete is that the Treasury should be a contributing party. If the landlord and the tenant both contribute something, it is only fair, when a great national settlement of this sort is under consideration, that the Treasury should take its part. I do not think it will be a satisfactory settlement if differential treatment of landlords is introduced, giving a larger bonus to those who sell before a particular date and a smaller bonus to those who sell afterwards. If the Treasury would come forward and secure that the same amount of bonus should be paid to the landlords in the future as has been done in the past, by advancing another £6,000,000, more will be done for the peace of Ireland than by any number of Coercion Acts. Coercion as a remedy has always failed. My experiences in the West of Ireland have burnt this into my soul, that coercion will only exasperate still more the people who are now imploringly stretching out their hands to this country, in the hope that at last peace and amity may dawn for them.

*THE EARL OF MAYO: My Lords, after the interesting speech of Lord MacDonnell on the subject of the finance of the Land Act of 1903, I desire to bring the House back to the question put to the Government by the noble Marquess, Lord Londonderry, regarding "the lawless condition of certain parts of Ireland." I do not wish to do so in any Party sense. I would much rather talk of other things than the condition of certain counties in Ireland, but we who live in Ireland cannot sit still and say nothing while the responsible Government take no steps to suppress the disorder. Lord Denman made the important admission that the present state of certain parts of Ireland was worse than at any time since the present Government had been in office. I think that is an important admission to have got from my noble friend. Personally I live in a part of the country that is quiet, and in peace with my near neighbours, my late tenants. Others are not so happily situated.

This is no question of religion, which is so often in Ireland the cause of discord, hatred, and even outrage, for during the time the present Government have been in office a priest's house has been fired into and a priest's cattle have been driven off his lands. This only shows that a lawless spirit has crept into the minds of the young men which did not exist before. I ask, Who is responsible for the state of certain counties in Ireland? Nine have been proclaimed under the Act of William IV. There is one man, and one man alone, who is responsible—the Chief Secretary; and I often ask myself what evil genius sent us the present Chief Secretary and what demon of unrest possessed the souls of those who appointed him.

What has happened during the rule of the present Chief Secretary? From March to September, 1905, the malicious injury claims amounted to £506; from January to June, 1908, they amounted to £10,178. These are claims made upon the counties for injury done through driving cattle and burning barns and hay sheds, etc.

The police have been increased by the present Government by 750, at an annual cost of £47,000. It has been pointed out that half of this cost is charged on the counties; but the other half is borne by the Imperial Exchequer, and that is a point to be remembered by the English taxpayer. The Chief Secretary, speaking in England, has over and over again tried to throw dust in the eyes of the English electorate by saying that Ireland was never more peaceful than it is at present. At Halifax, on 26th April, 1907, in what is known in political circles as the "carrion crow speech," the Chief Secretary said—

"Ireland is at this moment in a more peaceful condition than for the last 600 years."

It is quite true that Irishmen are not being ruined and murdered as they were under the Tudors, nor is there a Cromwell in Ireland burning and slaughtering the people. Comparisons are odious. Surely in the twentieth century we may expect civilised rule and law, order and progress to be maintained in the land. Only the other day—on 18th July—at Port Sunlight, the Chief Secretary said, speaking of Ireland—

"Now we got a great body of impartial persons, presided over by the late Tory Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, and he and all his companions, Tory landlords among them, combined and came to this unanimous conclusion, that, after all, these poor people were right and the Government were wrong in withholding the land."

First, let me say a word with regard to the Tory Lord-Lieutenant. Your Lordships heard Lord Dudley's speech before he left this country to go to Australia. I do not think it gave us the impression that he was a Tory Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland. The reference to his companions, the Tory landlords, includes, I suppose, Mr. Kavanagh, who was a member of that Commission. Mr. Kavanagh now represents a Nationalist constituency, and will, no doubt, vote for Home Rule like noble Lords opposite. Therefore I contend that the Chief Secretary's statement was made to throw dust in the eyes of the English electorate.

It is an outrageous thing that a man in the position of Chief Secretary should practically say to the people of Ireland that to agitate to get what was not their own by means of boycotting and outrage was a right thing for them to do. That is how it was construed. I hold that that is a monstrous creed. The power of the Chief Secretary is absolute. He has officials under him who have to obey his behests with the utmost subserviency. He can make or mar a man's career in Ireland, and he has, besides, enormous patronage. Now let me state how he discriminates in precisely similar offences between different classes of citizens. Mr. Farrell, M.P., held a meeting on 4th October at Moydon Cross Roads in County Longford, and openly advocated the boycotting of Mr. Henry Bruce Armstrong, a local landowner who declined to hand over his property to the League. As the direct result of his speech Mr. Armstrong's cattle were driven off his farm. This is precisely what occurred in County Clare in the case of Mr. Dermott O'Brien, who was arrested by the police and is now in prison in default of giving bail to be of good behaviour. Up to the present the Chief Secretary appears to have taken no action in the case of Mr. Farrell. Why on earth is not a Nationalist M.P. who is guilty of inciting to boycotting treated in the same way as Mr. O'Brien? It is difficult to conceive on what principles of law or equity a Member of Parliament in Ireland can defy the law with impunity, while other persons are put into prison for practically the same offence. This is one example of the present Chief Secretary's rule in Ireland, and of his method of dealing with boycotting and the driving of cattle. In answer to a question on the subject of boycotting, the Chief Secretary informed Mr. Long the other day that on 29th February last there were thirty-seven persons wholly boycotted, whilst on 31st August last the number had gone up to seventy-five, or more than double. The happier era which has been referred to will only come in Ireland when the law is properly administered and these blackguards are kept in order. We wish these plague spots adequately dealt with. It is because the Government think that a little cheap popularity will go a long way with the Nationalist Members in the House of Commons that this is not done. I will quote what an Irish Judge, Mr. Justice Kenny, said at Galway, on 20th July on this subject. He said—

“It is lamentable to think of the perpetual dread of outrage, misery, and wretchedness that must enter into the lives of these unfortunate people who have to pass their existence under such conditions.”

I know from my own knowledge that some of these places are a “hell upon earth.” Lord Denman told a story of an English governess. I know of a case of a lady’s maid who went over to spend her holiday with friends in Ireland. She said she walked alone, being afraid to speak to any one on the road in case that person had been boycotted. She said the place was like a desert, everybody being suspicious of everybody else, and her holiday, such as it was, very soon came to an end. I put that alongside the noble Lord’s story.

I have other instances in my hand showing the failure of the “ordinary law” and how this leniency has been interpreted as cowardice and connivance, but I will not delay your Lordships further. The only conclusion at which we can arrive is that it would be better for Ireland if the present Chief-Secretary—I speak of him only in his official capacity—could find some more congenial work in another political sphere. I am sure he would be less harassed, and we in Ireland would be greatly relieved. What is wanted is a Chief Secretary who is not afraid to administer the law—a strong man who will and can rule, and not a witty cynic.

VISCOUNT MASSEREENE: My Lords, the noble Lord who replied on behalf of the Government commented upon the fact that once more we had listened to speeches about lawlessness in Ireland, and that there was much similarity in the remarks. No one regrets more than I do the fact that your Lordships had to listen to those speeches. I can assure the noble Lord that we who come from Ireland do not consider it a pleasant task to speak in this House upon the condition of certain parts of that country. We do not do so from any sense except that of duty. The noble Marquess who initiated this discussion knows Ireland well and is fully competent to call attention to this matter. I should like to ask His Majesty’s Government one question. There are nine counties proclaimed in Ireland, and extra police engaged who are costing the people of Ireland a certain amount of additional money. How many more counties will have to be proclaimed before the Government take stronger steps to put an end to this lawlessness, assuming that the disorder does travel to additional counties?

There is one aspect of this case which I do not think has been presented, and I would put it in this way. Ireland is not a rich country, she has no great manufactories, no coal, no iron. Almost her staple industry is that of the raising and selling of cattle. This cattle-driving is doing that trade enormous harm. It is affecting a considerable number of people, and the trade is going down in many parts owing to these outrages. How long, I ask, is this to be allowed to continue? We see the trade gradually diminishing and the people who live by this industry becoming bankrupt. It seems to me that that is a most serious aspect of the case. Speakers far more able than myself have dealt with this question, but I should like specially to direct the attention of the Government to the financial loss that is accruing to the whole community in Ireland owing to the fact that one of her staple trades is at the present moment in a critical condition.

THE EARL OF DUNRAVEN: My Lords, I have no desire to cavil at the facts and figures put before your Lordships by my noble friend who opened the debate, and I certainly have no intention of expressing any opinion on the very difficult subject as to what is precisely the best way of dealing with the unfortunate, but, after all, sporadic cases of disorder that are occurring in Ireland. I only wish to say two or three words in protest against the inference that I fear is sure to be drawn from this debate in England as to the general condition of Ireland.

When a debate on this subject, of which we have had a great many in this House, is introduced by so important a member of the late Administration and inaugurated from the front Opposition bench, the attention it attracts in the country must be very great, and the people of England are naturally unacquainted with the real condition of Ireland. It is perfectly true that the noble Marquess, Lord Londonderry, confined himself in his Question to the lawless condition of certain parts of Ireland, but it is exceedingly difficult to confine one's remarks to any particular area. Even my noble friend himself in his speech spoke on several occasions of the "disorderly condition of Ireland," when, of course, he meant certain districts only.

The fact that these debates are raised and that literature is constantly cast upon the people of Great Britain narrating every conceivable occurrence in Ireland which by any possibility can be considered to be disorderly must have the effect of presenting a perfectly false picture of the general condition of Ireland. It is the easiest thing in the world to do that. Supposing anyone made out a list of all the lawlessness and disorder that had occurred in Great Britain itself during the last few years, they could convey a quite erroneous impression of the general state of this country. It would have to be stated that thousands of respectable householders in Great Britain refused to obey the law as a protest against the Education Act, and only the other day nearly the whole force of the Metropolitan Police was engaged in protecting the sacred precincts of Parliament. In regard to unemployment, council chambers have been stormed, and riot and disobedience to the law have been openly preached and riots have occurred not only in London, but in the provinces as well. Then there have been cases of gross municipal corruption. What inference would anyone not knowing England draw after hearing of these things?

I do not say one word condoning cattle-driving or the other offences referred to, but there is one peculiarity with regard to cattle-driving which ought to be mentioned. It has been denounced from the altar—that is not singular; but I think it is singular, though, perhaps, not absolutely novel, that it has been denounced also from the platform. Politicians, leaders of the people in Ireland, have spoken out strongly against cattle-driving, and it is not at all a popular pastime in Ireland. The great bulk of the people are against it. They see the idiotic folly of it and realise the expense it involves on the rates.

It ought not to be quite lost sight of that Ireland is passing through a great revolution in land tenure, and even if that revolution had been allowed to conduct itself as it might have done perfectly quietly, it would be almost, I think, unreasonable to suppose that so great a change could be accomplished without any sporadic cases of disorder occurring. Unfortunately the Land Act of 1903 has not had a fair chance. It has been violently opposed by forces in Ireland whose main desire seems to be to keep that country in a condition of perpetual disorder, and it has, unfortunately, been allowed to become blocked for want of sufficient financial support, and sufficient staff, and possibly through faulty administration. It is inevitable that the deadlock that has taken place in the Land Act must have caused an accentuation of crime in the direction of agrarian disorder. I agree with every word that Lord MacDonnell said on that point, and I most sincerely hope that His Majesty's Government will realise how completely the whole future of Ireland—social, industrial, and economic—depends upon the Land Act of 1903 proceeding with unnecessary friction and with reasonable speed. I think these matters ought to be considered.

It should not be lost sight of that, after all, there is, according to population, less crime in Ireland than in any other of the component parts of the United Kingdom. I do not desire to labour the point. I merely rose to make my protest against the inference that will be drawn from this debate. I agree with Lord MacDonnell that your Lordships on this side of the House would be better employed in centreing all your energies on endeavouring to persuade His Majesty's Government of the necessity of removing the deadlock in regard to the Land Act. I hope that in the report of my noble friend Lord Londonderry's speech the reporters will be careful to make it perfectly plain that he was referring only to certain districts in Ireland, for otherwise I feel sure that throughout England generally the impression will be formed that the whole of Ireland is in a state of considerable disorder. The popular party in Ireland, the people who want peace, conciliation, and quiet development of their business, and who are in favour of law and order are strong and are becoming stronger day by day, but they have a hard fight before them, they have considerable forces to contend against, and it is absolutely necessary, at any rate it is most desirable, that they should have the sympathy and support of the people of Great Britain on their side. Consequently I deprecate anything that could possibly present a false picture before the people of Great Britain as to the state of Ireland, and which might have the effect of alienating their sympathy.

*THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE: My Lords, the noble Lord who represents the Irish office observed early in the debate that in his opinion these discussions on Ireland served no useful purpose. That is true up to a certain point. I am afraid that, so far as His Majesty's Government are concerned, these debates do not serve any useful purpose, because the Government are, if I may be allowed to say so, impervious and incorrigible. We have had to-night all the old formulas to which we have so often listened as to the iniquity of what Ministers are pleased to call coercion and, worse than that, we have had again the use of that equivocal language which almost in the same breath condemns these outrages and offers an excuse for them.

The noble Lord told us with unction that he did not excuse or exculpate the individuals who were responsible for these deeds, but he went on immediately afterwards to draw a picture of the state of Ireland which was evidently intended to produce on our minds the impression that, while these poor people might be very misguided, yet there was, after all, a good deal to be said for their view of the case. But although I am afraid these discussions may not produce any great effect upon His Majesty's Government, I think they are useful so far as the impression which they will produce on the public mind is concerned. They will enable those who read the reports to judge for themselves of the manner in which His Majesty's Government have discharged the important trust committed to their hands in Ireland. My Lords, there has been no attempt to challenge the statement of facts laid before the House by my noble friend who sits behind me. The noble Lord who spoke for the Irish Office admitted very frankly that the condition of that part of the country about which we are speaking to-night is at this moment worse than it had ever been during the time in which His Majesty's Government have held office. That is my noble friend's case, and we have it admitted by the representative of the Irish Office. He could not do otherwise, because my noble friend confronted him with the statements made by the learned Judges in Ireland one after the other—statements which went to show that disorder in that particular part of Ireland was more prevalent than ever, and that the amount of immunity attending it was greater than it had ever been. You cannot brush aside evidence coming from such a quarter as that, and therefore, I say my noble friend behind me has proved his case and proved it up to the hilt.

My noble friend who spoke just now, Lord Dunraven, insisted that we should be very careful to avoid misleading the public as to the condition of other parts of Ireland. But the noble Marquess was careful throughout his speech to make it clear that he was only talking about the particular eight counties in which cattle-driving prevailed. The noble Lord opposite told us, indeed, that one single county was responsible for the greater part of these disorders. If that is the case surely there are two conclusions that one may draw. The first is that if the symptoms of disease are so acute, and are concentrated in this particular district, it is the duty of His Majesty's Government to deal with these occurrences just as a sanitary authority would deal with a particularly insanitary, although, perhaps, small area in a great city; and the second is that the mere fact of the trouble being concentrated in a particular district, not, perhaps, a very extensive one, renders it easier for the authorities to deal effectually with it if they set their hand to the task. When, however, we admit that these occurrences are limited to certain parts of Ireland, let us remember that cattle-drives naturally do not take place in parts of Ireland where there are no large herds of cattle to drive. Therefore, I rather doubt whether His Majesty's Government are entitled to take so much credit as they do for the peacefulness of other parts of the country. There is another consideration which should never be lost sight of when we are discussing these matters, and it is this—that there are parts of the country in which things are comparatively quiet, for the reason that intimidation prevails so completely in them that there is no friction or apparent trouble on the surface.

We lay the responsibility for the condition of things in these eight counties to the charge of His Majesty's Government, because, in the first place, they have most unwisely allowed it to appear that they are to this extent in sympathy with these cattle-driving operations, that the goal which the organisers of those operations desire to reach is the same goal at which they also desire to arrive. That has been laid down again and again in distinct language by the Chief Secretary. At the beginning of the present year he announced that what really occupied his mind and caused him most anxiety was how the grass lands of Ireland could be broken up and distributed among the people who required them for a livelihood. That was, to my mind, a very incautious and thoughtlessly proclaimed policy, because the breaking up of the grass lands all over Ireland means the breaking up of a particular form of industry without which the agricultural system of Ireland regarded as a whole cannot possibly be successful. That is one reason for which we regard His Majesty's Government responsible.

But there is another reason—a reason which has been dwelt upon by previous speakers this evening. His Majesty's Government have deliberately abandoned the means with which Parliament has provided them for putting down these illegal operations. They have given up the Peace Preservation Act, which one Chief Secretary after another has regarded as indispensable for the government of Ireland and which they found in operation when they assumed office in certain districts which had been proclaimed, not by Unionist or Conservative Governments, but by Liberal Governments and by Liberal Chief Secretaries. They gave that up. The result is that you find a marked increase in the number of outrages in which firearms have been used. Everybody knew that that result was likely to happen, and it did happen.

Then there is their failure to avail themselves of the provisions of the Crimes Act and their fatuous desire to rely exclusively upon what they are pleased to call the ordinary law. The Crimes Act is part of the law of the land; it is on the Statute-book, and there are parts of it—parts which would be most effective for putting down cattle-driving—which can be made use of without any proclamation and without resort to anything which can properly be described as inconsistent with the ordinary law of the land. Instead of using this effectual measure, His Majesty's Government are relying upon old Acts of Parliament which differ in this from the Crimes Act that, while their procedure is in certain respects less favourable to the person put upon his trial, on the other hand the penalty imposed is an ineffectual and derisory penalty, while the tribunal is a less efficient tribunal than that to which you can appeal under the Crimes Act. That is the difference between the two. His Majesty's Government have deliberately preferred an old and ineffectual law to the law which is ready to their hand, and which would give them an effectual remedy for the trouble with which they have to deal.

We were told that on former occasions the application of the Crimes Act had not had the desired effect, and noble Lords opposite declare that they are afraid of setting it in motion because they think its application is likely to increase the volume of crime. My Lords, did it increase the volume of crime when it was set in force before? It has been shown, on the contrary, that the application of the Crimes Act resulted in diminishing the volume of crime. We had an interesting speech, and one which, if no other speech did so, would render this debate memorable, from Lord Mac-Donnell, and I hope that your Lordships will take note of the statement that fell from him at the outset of his remarks. He told your Lordships, speaking with intimate knowledge not only of the facts as the public knows them, but of the under-currents which were then moving in the Irish political world, that he personally would have been in favour of using what I think he called sharper methods in dealing with the principal instigators of these crimes. But the advice of the trained administrator was brushed aside, and His Majesty's Government preferred to be guided by the advice of their Attorney-General.

We know what the policy of the Attorney-General in regard to this question has been. It is the policy founded upon what His Majesty's Government are pleased to describe as sympathy with the Irish people. Let me tell them that I for one am deeply convinced that what the Irish people sympathise with more than anything else is a strong Government that knows its own mind. I doubt whether your so-called sympathetic treatment has won you very much genuine affection, certainly not very much genuine respect from the people of Ireland. The noble Lord who spoke for the Irish Office gave us, however, a very candid and very interesting piece of information as to the real reason for which this policy, this feeble policy, was preferred by His Majesty's Government. He told us that the people of Ireland had been led to believe by the public utterances of leading Members of the Liberal Party that His Majesty's Government would refrain from coercive measures. So that it really comes to this, that disorder is to be allowed to remain rampant in eight counties, honest people are to be persecuted and their lives made unbearable, because, forsooth, presumably, before they took office, the leading Members of the Liberal Party had announced that it was their intention to refrain from using those weapons which lay ready to their hand.

I venture to describe that as a fatuous policy. It is a policy which was initiated as an experimental policy, but the experiment has been a miserable failure. It was recommended by the Attorney-General on the ground that he desired to associate the people with the administration of the criminal law. My Lords, I wonder whether His Majesty's Ministers seriously believe that in County Clare you are likely to get efficient administration of the criminal law by associating the peasantry of that county with that administration. Can the noble Earl who will follow me lay his hand upon his heart and say that with his knowledge of Ireland he believes for a single moment that an attempt to associate the people of County Clare with the administration of the criminal law is likely to serve the interests of order and justice?

There are not many ways in which you can associate people with the administration of the criminal law. You can make some of them magistrates. You have made a good many of them magistrates in Ireland; some of them are magistrates ex officio. Will the noble Earl tell us that he has found these ex officio magistrates very valuable allies in the administration of the criminal law in County Clare? Another way—and a very valuable way—is to employ the people as jurymen. What do we know of the result of trial by jury in that part of Ireland? Whenever you do associate the people with the administration of the criminal law the result is that they make the criminal law of no effect. I am told—I believe it is the case—that there has not been a single conviction for agrarian crime by a common jury in the West and Midland counties since His Majesty's Government came into office. As to juries, the Irish Government have ceased to rely upon them. They do not dare to put an accused person before a jury. The result is that there have been 413 cases of cattle-driving reported in six months, and in no single case has the accused person been put before a common jury. That is an illustration of the results of endeavouring to associate the people of a disorderly district with the administration of the criminal law in that district.

We have been told that the object of His Majesty's Government in this exhibition of extraordinary and misplaced leniency is to produce a healthier feeling in the disaffected parts of Ireland. I confess I see no signs of the growth of that healthier feeling. Perhaps the noble Earl will be able to tell us whether his diagnosis differs from mine. But whilst His Majesty's Ministers are waiting for that healthier feeling to grow up, law-abiding citizens are being ill-treated and persecuted and the public is losing that respect for law and order which is a condition of civilised government all over the world. In order to promote that healthier feeling we are to have more Irish legislation. A Bill is to be produced, founded upon the Report of the Royal Commission presided over by Lord Dudley. I shall, of course, not attempt to anticipate the contents of that Bill. I will only say this, that I hope the framers of it will read, mark, learn and inwardly digest not only the main Report of the Commission, but also some of the documents attached to it, and notably the separate Report made by my noble friend on the back benches and another extremely valuable document attached by Sir John Colomb.

My noble friend Lord Dunraven referred to legislation of another kind, with which I confess I am much more in sympathy—I mean legislation dealing with the question of land purchase. I do not think I should be quite in order if I were to enter at length into that subject. I only desire to express my entire concurrence with what fell from Lord Dunraven and from Lord MacDonnell when they told us that it was all important that no interruption in the steady progress of the purchase of land in Ireland should be allowed to occur.

But before I sit down let me say this one thing with regard to Irish legislation. Do not believe that any legislation, whether it is the Bill which we are told to expect, dealing with the question of congestion, or any measure dealing with the question of land purchase—do not expect that any legislation affecting Ireland will succeed unless the Government of the day make up their minds to maintain law and order in that country. Your remedial measures will fail if you allow the attention of the public to be distracted from them by the kind of occurrences which are happening every day in Ireland at the present time. Those who are responsible for the government of Ireland must be aware that, even in regard to the particular matter of relief for the congested districts, it may be necessary for them to deal with a very firm hand indeed with the forces which operate in Irish agricultural society. It has already been made abundantly clear that there is likely to be a fierce and bitter struggle for the possession of these grass lands between the people who inhabit the congested districts in other parts of Ireland and those who, living in the grazing districts, have not got farms themselves and are described as the landless men. You will have a fierce struggle between those two, and unless you are prepared to hold the balance with a firm hand your legislation will fail. I daresay some of your Lordships may have seen in the newspapers an account of a visit paid by a Government inspector to some untenanted land which had been acquired by His Majesty's Government for the purpose of finding room for people from congested districts, on which occasion the men on the spot rose and I believe, hunted the inspector off the land in such a manner that he had to retire without completing the duty which he had been set to perform. The first duty of His Majesty's Government is to see that the law is respected and to protect those who obey the law, and if they fail in the future, as I am afraid they have failed in the past, to secure obedience to the law, then I do not believe that any of their remedial measures are likely to have fair play or to be successful.

*THE LORD PRIVY SEAL AND SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (The Earl of CREWE): My Lords, it would be affectation if I were to pretend to be surprised that the subject of the administration of Ireland should once more be debated in your Lordships' House. I make no complaint of the action of the noble Marquess in introducing it, although I am in general agreement with my noble friend behind me and also with the noble and learned Lord the Lord Chancellor that there is some risk that harm may be done both in Ireland and in England by debates of this kind.

But on one specific point I do make a very distinct complaint against the noble Marquess. In the course of his speech the noble Marquess challenged my noble friend behind me, Lord MacDonnell, to state his opinion and give a justification of the policy which was pursued when he was Permanent Under-Secretary in Ireland. To do that would be, to my mind, a breach of political propriety. I would like very much to know what the noble Marquess the Leader of the Opposition would say if, on a question of foreign politics, we were to appeal to Lord Sanderson and call upon him to justify the foreign policy of the Government at the time he was Permanent Secretary. We are all proud to see in this House men like my noble friend and Lord Sanderson, who have filled high positions in the Civil Service, but I do not think any of us are entitled to cross-question them as to the policy pursued by the Departments of which they were formerly members.

I fully admit that, so far as certain districts in Ireland are concerned, a condition of very considerable gravity prevails, and that, as my noble friend behind me frankly admitted, the condition there is less favourable than it has been during the last two years. But it is necessary to make certain reservations on that point. The noble Lord spoke of eight counties as though the whole were in a condition of active disturbance. That is not the case. The disturbances are sporadic. They break out first in one place and then in another. There are parts of some counties which were much disturbed a year ago and are now in a state that may properly be described as quiet; on the other hand, there are new districts in which disorder has broken out to an active extent. It is necessary, therefore to make that caution.

It is also necessary to make another caution. The noble and learned Lord opposite, Lord Ashbourne, spoke as though crime in Ireland were a fixed quantity, and as though the liquid rose and fell in the tube according to the application of particular legal measures; but crime in Ireland depends, and always has depended, on the particular condition of things at a particular moment. Therefore comparisons of one period with another are of very little value. The noble and learned Lord said triumphantly that when Mr. Long left office Ireland was in a peaceful condition. At that time what I may call the glamour of the Purchase Act was still over Ireland. That glamour has, I am sorry to say, to a considerable extent passed away, particularly from those districts where most disorder now prevails. It would, of course, be a gross exaggeration to speak of the Act as having broken down, although I think one may say that its finance has broken down. There is no doubt that the particular parts of Ireland in which disorder most reigns are not those in which the Act has operated most, or most to the advantage of the inhabitants. Men hear of and see large sales of great estates going on in the prosperous parts of Ireland, while sales in their immediate neighbourhood are conducted slowly and with great difficulty, and this creates a feeling of unrest which at any time is liable to lead to disturbance.

Then there is a new element in what is called the grass-land question, on which the noble Marquess who leads the Opposition and other noble Lords have spoken. In one sense, at any rate, that is a new question. When Lord Londonderry or I was in Ireland the possibility of dividing up any part of the grazing lands and turning them into holdings was, so far as I know, never contemplated by anybody. Therefore, when you are speaking of criminal statistics you must consider these points of cause and effect. This question of the grass lands has grown up gradually. It was recognised in Mr. Wyndham's Act; Section 8, I think it is, of that Act deals with untenanted land. Then you have had the operations of the Congested Districts Board; and I think it cannot be denied that the provisions of Mr. Wyndham's Act and that action have given an impetus to the feeling, often exaggerated and certainly finding vent in most reprehensible and criminal acts in some cases, that the policy of dividing the grass lands is a policy adopted, not only by this Government, but by the late Government, and that almost any man may hope in time to get a share of a grass farm. It is unfortunate that that should be so.

I fully recognise the special difficulty of dealing with the whole question to which the noble Marquess who spoke last drew attention. If legislation were passed to-morrow I admit that you do not settle the question as to who the particular people are who may properly be supplied with farms formed out of untenanted land, and you cannot guard against people wanting farms which ought under no circumstances to be turned from the grazing purpose to which they are now put. But we have to admit this grass hunger, if I may use the expression, and it is, so far as I know, responsible for the whole of the disturbances in these eight counties.

The noble Marquess spoke of the increase of outrages with firearms, and blamed us for having dropped the annual renewal of the Peace Preservation Act. I think we admitted at the time that that was a policy which might very fairly be argued against, and that it might be said by some to be an imprudent step, but I do not think it is possible, as a matter of fact, to establish any connection between the dropping of that Act and the firing outrages which have taken place. After all, when that Act was in full force there were many more, and much worse, firing outrages than there are now. It is perfectly true that the very odious and contemptible form of intimidation known as firing into dwellings has seriously increased. The increase has very largely been in the county of Clare, to which allusion has been made. That county has for many years past had a character of its own. I think we should all have said of County Clare what I daresay my noble friend the Secretary of State for India would say of such a place as Poona—namely, that if there is trouble there it is of a more deep seated and worse kind than in any other part of the country. That has always been the case, certainly within the last forty years, in County Clare, and I will not pause to inquire into what the causes of that may be. As regards the cases of firing into dwellings, it is quite true that people have not been brought to justice. That is because they have not been arrested.

It is an offence extremely difficult to bring home to the perpetrator, and therefore it cannot be said that our system of dealing with prosecutions has had any effect so far as this particular class of outrage is concerned.

Now I come to cattle-driving; and I believe that when the noble Earl, Lord Dunraven, said that cattle-driving was anything but a popular practice, he was speaking the whole truth. I think at first cattle-driving was regarded somewhat leniently by a great many people in the districts where it took place; they regarded it as a sort of practical joke, of a violent kind no doubt, but still not much more than a practical joke. I think that what has happened since, and in particular the charge placed for extra police upon the counties, has caused a great many people in the neighbourhood to regard it as anything but a joke. The noble Marquess asked whether in regard to these cattle-driving cases we had been able to obtain any assistance from popular feeling, and he quoted a statement by the Attorney-General for Ireland that if we could associate the people with the administration of justice it would be a very desirable thing to do. The noble Marquess named two instances—the presence on the Bench of ex-officio magistrates and the service of citizens upon juries. As far as regards jury service, I am afraid we cannot profess to have found much improvement. It is a deplorable fact, and has been for many years—certainly in the time of the noble Marquess—that for a very large class of crimes you cannot get juries in Ireland to convict.

THE MARQUESS OF LONDONDERRY: You can if you change the venue, as we did.

*THE EARL OF CREWE: I am afraid not always then.

THE MARQUESS OF LONDONDERRY: We did.

*THE EARL OF CREWE: I think the noble Marquess must have had his share of failures, too. As regards ex-officio magistrates, it no doubt has been the case that in some instances the presence of ex-officio magistrates who do not do their duty has interfered with the administration of justice. But I am able to give an instance to the contrary which, to my mind, is an encouraging one, because it took place in that very county to which the noble Marquess alluded—County Clare. These forty-three young men, all by general consent respectable—that is to say, I suppose, that they belong to the more or less solid farmer class—were brought up and charged with cattle-driving. The resident magistrate and two ex-officio magistrates, if I remember rightly, were present. The defendants were all bound to the peace and in default of giving the securities all went to gaol, and one of the ex-officio magistrates made a short statement in which he denounced the practice of cattle-driving and declared his adhesion to the principle of the sentence. Of course, noble Lords may say that the sentence was not a severe one, and that this does not amount to very much, but I think it means a good deal considering the circumstances under which it happened, and the place at which it occurred, and to my mind it is a very hopeful sign of a revived spirit of independence among those who are called upon to administer justice in this way.

We are asked once more why we did not revive, at any rate, one of the provisions of the Act of 1887. The Act of 1887, is one of those measures which is regarded with almost romantic affection by its authors. Both the noble Marquess and the noble and learned Lord have had affectionate experience of that Act, and they would like to see it put into free use. Their regard for it is of the same nature and quality as Mr. Balfour's regard for the Education Act of 1902. The noble and learned Lord is one of the most practised debaters in this House, and in that capacity he went through the familiar operation of begging the entire question. He assumed that if we had applied this particular provision of trial by two magistrates at the beginning of the cattle-driving disorder it would have immediately ceased. That is an assumption about which it is impossible to argue, simply because each person must maintain his own opinion. I do not say that it would not have been possible. Of course, it would have been possible to have put a few more people in prison. But the real force of what the noble and learned Lord said must depend upon what the strength of the movement really was. Lord Clonbrock asked—

“What is the use of binding people over to peace, for if they do go to gaol, there are always others ready to take their place?”

It is a remarkable fact that the people who have been bound over to keep the peace have very seldom appeared again in these transactions. Would not that argument also hold good if you sent people to gaol? Does it not show that there is this very large body of people who are prepared to engage in this practice, and it does seem to me an unwarrantable assumption that simply because you were able to send a certain number of people to gaol with hard labour you would necessarily—

LORD CLONBROCK: They are very often bound over and remain at liberty. They do not go to gaol.

*THE EARL OF CREWE: That is true; but those who are bound over do not take part in subsequent cattle-driving. It seems to me that the assumption is one which the noble and learned Lord is at liberty to make, but one which is not, as a matter of fact, supported by the past history of the country.

LORD ASHBOURNE: It is supported by the entire history of the administration of the Act.

*THE EARL OF CREWE: I do not agree with the noble and learned Lord there, and I think it is necessary to give one caution, because what fell from the noble Marquess who leads the Opposition may in one point be misunderstood. I understood my noble friend Lord MacDonnell to say he would have approved of stronger measures being taken at the outset against those whom he described as the instigators of these outrages. By that I take him to mean the Members of Parliament who made speeches. But do not let it be thought that my noble friend advocated the use of the Crimes Act, because I understood him to say that that is exactly what he did not do.

LORD MACDONNELL OF SWINFORD: Situated as I am now, I would have approved of the more sharp method of dealing with these people. But I did not intend to make any reference to what my approval or disapproval was when I was a servant of the Irish Government.

*THE EARL OF CREWE: My noble friend was, I understood, speaking of the instigators of the movement. He did not say anything about different treatment of those who actually took part in the cattle-driving. The alternative which we have chosen and which we maintain is that of the provision of extra police, and we do believe that, as a considerable part of the cost falls upon the districts, it will have a certain effect in turning public attention in the direction of the maintenance of law and order. I should be very sorry to have it supposed that we regard this method or any other method as a panacea, or a perfect system for entirely stopping crime in Ireland. I think the whole history of Ireland shows that whenever there has been an outburst of crime and outrage in relation to a particular movement such as this, accounted for as this can be in all its features and in all its stages, no method has been discovered, and, after all, it is not surprising, for completely dealing with such ebullitions of public feeling. But we think that there is at any rate one method of action which can have no effect. There may be advantages attaching to what we call coercive measures, and there are advantages, as we think, attaching to the plan which we follow; but I am quite certain there can be no advantage in hovering backwards and forwards between the two.

In this matter you have to take a line and stick to it. As I understand, the line which noble Lords opposite would take would be to repress, and, I suppose, if the repressive measures adopted were not sufficient they would have to apply more repressive measures still. We have taken the line which was, I think, very fairly described by my noble friend in a phrase to which the noble Marquess objected. My noble friend did not say that we were in any way bound, by any obligation to anybody in Ireland, to adopt any particular policy with regard to this matter. That, of course, is not so. We are bound to nobody. But we are anxious, it is perfectly true—and we are not ashamed of it—to administer the Irish Government so far as possible in a sympathetic spirit, and we recognise the very intimate connection which exists between these deplorable and sporadic outbreaks of crime and the question, which has somehow got to be dealt with or solved, of the relief of congestion and, so far as possible, the allocation of at any rate some of the grass lands in Ireland to those who are now insufficiently provided. That, as I say, is the line which we have taken, and to that line we must adhere. It is not the least indifference to the claims of the law or any carelessness about the preservation of order which make us decline to adopt a particular remedy upon which noble Lords opposite lay so much stress.

INDIANS IN THE TRANSVAAL

*LORD AMPHILL rose “(1) to call attention to the imprisonment of Mr. Ghandi and other members of the Indian community in the Transvaal, and to inquire what communications have been received from India by His Majesty’s Government on the subject of the treatment of British Indians in South Africa; (2) to inquire whether the Secretary of State for the Colonies has received any complaints to the effect that Indians thus arrested have been harshly treated and inadequately and improperly fed in the prisons, and, if so, how he has dealt with such complaints; (3) to inquire whether the Traders’ Licensing Bills passed by the Legislature of Natal have been submitted for Imperial sanction, and, if so, what action His Majesty’s Government intend to take; and (4) to move for papers.” The noble Lord said: My Lords, I hope your Lordships will not think me unduly pertinacious in bringing up this question again and will believe that nothing would be more painful to me personally than if my action were so regarded. I feel bound by every consideration of honour, and in pursuance of my duty as a former servant of the Crown in India, to refer to this subject so long as I can hope that any useful purpose may be served by so doing. I wish that I could persuade your Lordships to see this question in the same light in which it appears to me. I do not doubt for one moment that your Lordships feel exactly the same as I do, that you are animated by the strongest sympathy for the Indians in the Transvaal and very sincerely regret that they should have any cause to complain of their treatment under the British flag, but what I do wish is that I could persuade any large body of your Lordships to give expression to those feelings in such a manner as would not only help His Majesty's Government but would also convince our fellow-countrymen in the Transvaal that there is a strong feeling in this country on the question. I see in the continued failure to solve this problem a source of danger to the Empire at large and which may ere long become absolutely uncontrollable. It is the breach in the dyke which is becoming wider and wider—a breach which might in the first instance have been repaired with a few spadefuls of sand, the work of a small child, but which will now require the fevered labour of many people even if it be repaired at all and be made fit to keep out the torrential inrush of the sea.

What are the broad facts of the situation? I will confine myself to those facts, not only on account of the lateness of the hour, but also because it is the broad facts which are beyond possibility of dispute. I think that they are these:—one of the ostensible reasons why the South African War was waged was the redress of the grievances of our Indian fellow-subjects in the Transvaal, grievances which formed the subject of the most indignant protest on the part of our leading statesmen. The result of the South African war was to place the Imperial Government in the position of being able to redress those grievances. But what has actually happened? It is clear that the grievances still remain and that they must be a great deal more acute than they were before. Under the rule of the South African Republic the Indians were discontented, but there was no question of their having to suffer imprisonment, deprivation of property, banishment, and every kind of indignity rather than submit to the laws. That, my Lords, is what they are doing now rather than submit to laws which have been passed under the British flag, under the British Government. These Indians are not suffragettes or Socialists who are encouraged in a political agitation by the certainty of notoriety and of the applause of a considerable body of people. They have nobody to applaud them, they can hope for no notoriety which would be any satisfaction to them. Theirs is not a struggle for any sort or kind of political rights. They know full well that it would be absolutely futile for them to attempt anything of the kind. No, what they are fighting for, what they are struggling for is their very existence.

The tendency and, I am bound to say it, the real object, as it seems to me, of recent legislation in the Transvaal has been nothing more nor less than the extermination of the community of Indians who are resident there. With each successive surrender of the Imperial Government, with each successive diplomatic defeat, the success of this policy becomes more and more assured, and it is because its success has become so very nearly complete that the Indians have been driven to these courses, to suffer anything in order to save their community from actual extermination. What is the professed policy of the Colonial Government? I will endeavour to state it as nearly as I can in the actual words of the High Commissioner, Lord Selbourne, who was good enough to write to me on the subject. He said—

“Our policy is to treat the Indians who are now resident in the Transvaal with every possible consideration, but not to admit any more, that is, of course, subject to reasonable exceptions.”

Now the Indians themselves have no objection to that policy. They are perfectly ready to accept that policy, and that being so there is no reason why we should not accept it ourselves. All that they ask, and all that those who think with me ask on their behalf, is that that policy should be actually carried out, and that the methods by which it is carried out should be fair.

Now we come to the question as to what are the methods. How is our consideration shown to the Indians in the Transvaal? It is shown to them by legislation which has driven them to passive resistance, and to a ready acceptance of all the cruel consequences of their passive resistance. How has the question of immigration been treated? It has been made, what it never was before, absolute; that is to say, not limited by any real exception. There is a nominal exception, it is true, and that is in favour of ruling chiefs from India or high officials of Asiatic descent. But is it conceivable that any Indian chief, that any ruling prince of India, would pay a visit to Natal in order, forsooth, to be insulted as a "coolie," for even the Ministers, the statesmen of the Colony, do not hesitate so to stigmatise the well-born, highly-educated men of high caste who lead the Indian community. It follows from what I have just said that there are two questions. The first is that of the treatment of the Indians resident in the Colony, the treatment of Indians who have a right to be there, who were there before the war, and whose right to be there has been admitted over and over again. The second question is that of future immigration. Those two questions must be kept absolutely separate, and I do not propose, on account of the late hour, to enter into details of either of them, but I will go on at once to what would have been the conclusion of the argument on which I should otherwise have embarked. I will ask you how could the present situation have been averted in regard to each and either of those two questions?

In regard to the first question, that of the treatment of resident Indians, I say that the present situation might have been averted by the repeal of the registration law. Why should that registration law not have been repealed? Your Lordships will remember that the Indians voluntarily submitted to giving the finger-impressions and to registering as the result of a compromise which was arrived at in January. They say that the condition on which they made this voluntary agreement was the repeal of the Registration Act. The Colonial Ministers say that no such promise was made. It is, therefore, a question of which of the two sides you believe. I have no hesitation whatever in believing the Indian statement as to the conditions and I hold that on prima facie evidence it is hardly to be doubted. On what other conceivable condition could the Indians have voluntarily submitted to that which they have declared to be intolerable and humiliating to them under the compulsion of the Act unless it was the repeal of the compulsory law which caused them such indignity and humiliation? So far as I can see that is the only possible understanding on which they could have submitted to that compromise.

But even supposing that no promise was made, why should this Act not have been repealed during the last few months? It is no longer needed. The Transvaal Government have got all the Indians entered on their register. They know how many there are in the Colony for they have all come forward and submitted to registration. That, I think, was the original purpose and only professed intention of the Government—to ascertain how many Indians there were, who they were, and what they were. They have got that information, and so the Act has served its purpose and might very well have been repealed. If there were any goodwill, if there were any generosity towards the community, who have no votes, no political power, and are absolutely in the hands and under the control of the white colonists, surely that might have been done in order to avoid the present deplorable situation.

In regard to the question of future immigration, how might the present situation have been averted? I think that might have been done by allowing reasonable exceptions to the restriction of immigration. The position is this. The Indians are quite content to abide by the immigration law of last year as interpreted by the Courts, and if not worked in connection with this Registration Act, the repeal of which they say was promised. They are not only prepared to abide by the educational test, but they go further. They say: "Make that educational test as strict as you like; add to it if you will a condition that only a limited number of Indians, even as few as six, may enter in any year, and we shall make no further complaint. We shall feel ourselves bound by honour not to ask for more, and to agree with what you have done. All we want is that those few people who are necessary for the continued life of our community, without whom our community must perish, that is to say, the few doctors and lawyers and priests whom we require, should be allowed to enter the Colony. That is all we ask." I think this a concession which might have been made.

Now I pass rapidly to the question which is naturally asked by every thinking man with whom you discuss this question. What can the Secretary of State, what can His Majesty's Government, do? I appreciate to the full the difficulties in which the noble Earl finds himself placed. His position is that all the opportunities of refusing consent to the progress of oppressive legislation have already been given away, and all the opportunities of bargaining which formerly existed have equally been lost. But, nevertheless, knowing the noble Earl as I do, I do not despair of his being able to make use of those great qualities which we have learned to know and to admire in this House. The noble Earl has behind him the general power and influence of the Imperial Government, and that power and influence would exist even if in the case of Indians it were not most specially reserved under the Constitution which was granted to the Transvaal Colony.

But supposing there were no reserved powers; supposing that we had not even that shadowy power of "suzerainty" by which we were able to oblige the South African Republic to treat Indians moderately, we should still have the power which we should exercise in the case of a foreign country with which, as might be imagined, we had a treaty or agreement that they should treat the citizens of the British Empire with justice and consideration. Or, imagine even that we had no such treaty and that in any foreign country our fellow-subjects were ill-treated, oppressed, driven out of the country, banished, deprived of their means of livelihood, of the fortunes and incomes they had built up during the course of many years residence; supposing that these things were done to them, do your Lordships imagine for one moment that we should not take such steps as were necessary to bring about a fairer treatment of those fellow subjects of ours? But surely, my Lords, we should not be taking any of the risks which would be involved in so dealing with a foreign country if we were to negotiate with the colonists of the Transvaal. We take risks, as your Lordships know, on behalf of persecuted communities and oppressed nationalities for whom we have no responsibility whatever. We are willing to take risks, the most extreme risks, if it is a matter, say, of persecuted Armenians or of natives of the Congo, but surely we run no risks of that kind in dealing with the colonists of the Transvaal. If they are indeed British, as we have been so loudly and frequently assured they have become since they received their Constitution, surely they have the honour of our race at heart; surely they have the honour of this nation, of the Imperial Government at heart, and would never wish to bring about the violation of pledges which have been made before the world and civilised mankind over and over again. Surely they must see that it cannot be to their interests to jeopardise the peace and the security of the Empire by producing, as I tell your Lordships with all sincerity and earnestness I believe they may do, very much greater and far more serious discontent in India than exists at the present time.

But even if they do not see these things, if they do not regard—and I think they must if it were put to them rightly—these questions of honour and expediency, surely they must know that it cannot be to their own ultimate and larger interests that there should be disturbance of internal peace and that there should be controversy within the British Empire.

I know that a Blue Book has just been published; I have only just obtained a copy and have not had time to read it; but, nevertheless, I have thought it best not to postpone my several specific questions because I hold that a statement from the Secretary of State will be more widely read and will carry greater weight than the official despatches in any Blue-Books. I trust that that which the Secretary of State may have to say will be of an encouraging nature and may lead us to hope that even now, in spite of the latest most anxious and disquieting news, there is hope of some generous concession on the part of the Transvaal Government, something that may lead to a solution of this most difficult, and to my mind most anxious problem.

Moved, "That an humble Address be presented to His Majesty for Papers relating to the imprisonment of Mr. Gandhi and other members of the Indian community in the Transvaal."—(Lord Amthill.)

*THE EARL OF CREWE: I am sorry that the noble Lord was obliged to bring this matter on at so late an hour, partly because I should have liked him to have had a fuller House in dealing with this very interesting subject, and partly also because the fact that a Blue Book was published to-day does seem to me to make it a little premature to raise a discussion on this subject in the House. At the same time I quite appreciate the noble Lords' desire to hear a statement which, under the circumstances, will be a very brief one, by me upon the subject. I think, if the noble Lord will forgive me, there is need for great caution in approaching this question. Of all unfortunate things that could happen, it seems to me the most unfortunate that we should appear to be taking sides over this question, either in this House, or elsewhere, and divide ourselves into two classes of pro-English and pro-Indians. That would be, in my mind, an entirely false way of looking at this which is an instance of one of the very greatest of the difficulties that confront those who have to take part in the government of this great Empire, viz., the relations between the white and the coloured races that inhabit different parts of it.

I do not know that at this moment there is a more difficult and anxious problem of government than that, and I am sorry therefore, that the noble Lord, whose enthusiasm on behalf of those whom he served so well, I can quite comprehend, seemed to go somewhat far, I will not say in taking sides, but in making imputations against the Colonial Government in this matter. For instance, the noble Lord said it appeared to him that the object of the Transvaal Government was to exterminate the Indian colony there. I have followed closely, of course, the various phases of the difficulty, and I do not think that is an expression which can in any way be justified by what the Colonial Government have done. In the second place, the noble Lord alluded to a difference of opinion on a matter of fact which had taken place between the Indian leaders and the Colonial Secretary for the Transvaal. The noble Lord said that obviously one party was not speaking the truth, and the party he believed was not the Indian party. I think the noble Lord might have reflected that where a diametrically different account of a conversation or of conversations is given by two parties, it is possible that the fact may be due to a misunderstanding and not to wilful mendacity on one side or the other, and I am sorry that the noble Lord should have made a charge of that kind, which I am certain it is impossible to support.

So far as the imprisonment of Mr. Gandhi, which I very greatly regret, is concerned, I have no official knowledge of it, no knowledge of it beyond what I have seen in the newspapers, but I have telegraphed to the Transvaal in order to find out what the particular circumstances connected with Mr. Gandhi's imprisonment were. I assume, of course, that he has been taking part in that passive resistance campaign and that he has paid the penalty which no doubt he intended to pay for a breach of the existing law. I do not desire at this moment to enter into the very complicated question of the controversy which has taken place, and I do not think it would be fair of the House to do so, but I should like to say one word upon what fell from the noble Lord with regard to the question of exceptions of entry in the cases of Indians who were not domiciled in the Transvaal before the war. I have not been able entirely to understand whether the Indian community demanded generally the entrance of those who were able to pass an education test, or whether, first, they adopted the very much milder proposal which, I understand, the noble Lord makes, viz., that a very small number of Indians should be admitted to fulfil certain functions which obviously could not be filled by replacing from the community—such classes as lawyers and priests. So far as I am able to judge from seeing the papers for a considerable time the demand was for a general entrance of Indians who were able to pass a high education test, and that, I fancy, is a point on which it would be altogether impossible to induce the Transvaal Government to give way, and I understand that the noble Lord, on behalf of his friends, abandons that.

But as regards the admission of a few people of a special kind, the case in my opinion is an entirely different one. The noble Lord spoke of exceptions as applying only to native chiefs of high rank and persons of distinction, but the noble Lord will recognise that in the last Act there is power given to the Governor to make exceptions of a general kind, and I think it would be very reasonable, and I have expressed that view in communicating with the Government, that some kind of undertaking might be given that the people specially admitted by the Governor, that is to say, by the Government acting in Council, from time to time should comprise a sufficient number of those of the professional classes to supply the wastage which from time to time must take place in the community. That is a point on which I hope a really satisfactory arrangement may be reached.

The noble Lord next asks whether we have received any complaints to the effect that the Indians arrested have been harshly treated and inadequately fed in prison. I did receive a complaint of the kind stating that there had been cases of great hardship, including that of old persons and children at various places having been placed in rooms which were not clean and not having had the food that they required. I immediately telegraphed the Governor of the Transvaal to find out what the truth was of those statements and to ask for a report by telegraph. I have not yet that report; when I receive it I shall be happy to communicate it to the noble Lord opposite.

Then the noble Lord asks a third question on which he said nothing, but which, perhaps, he might like me to answer. It refers to the Traders' Licensing Bills passed by the Legislature of Natal. Three Bills were introduced into the Natal Legislature. The effect of the first was to prohibit indentured labour from 30th June, 1911. That was a Bill which undoubtedly would have lain within the competence of the Natal Government to undertake, but the Bill has, as a matter of fact, been dropped altogether. The second Bill, which we have not yet seen in its complete and final form, forbids any licence to trade being given to an Indian after 31st December, 1908, and the third provides for the total extinction of all Indian licences after the lapse of ten years. As soon as I received the intimation that those Bills had been introduced I wrote a despatch and sent it to the Governor of Natal drawing attention to the nature of the Bills and explaining that it was exceedingly improbable that we should be able to advise His Majesty to assent to the provisions of the last two. I thought it desirable to give a warning of that kind immediately, but I have not yet received the Bills in their final form, and when they do arrive we shall be able to give them our full attention. The noble Lord finishes up by moving for Papers, but he will understand that he has just got one lot and will not be in a hurry to ask for any more just at this moment. We will keep him supplied with all the information we can.

Motion by leave, withdrawn.

OLD-AGE PENSIONS ACT.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN, who had given notice to ask whether Treasury instructions issued in regard to the Old-Age Pensions Act are held to have the force of regulations; and, if so, whether such instructions will be laid on the Table of the House," said: Your Lordships will remember that under the Old-Age Pensions Act a large part of the administration is to be effected by means of regulations which were to be drawn jointly by the Treasury, the Post Office, and the Local Government Board. A certain set of regulations have been promulgated and have been laid on the Table in due course according to the provisions of the Act. But the Treasury has issued certain instructions. I am not now speaking of instructions to servants or officials of the Treasury—that is a different matter altogether—but of instructions which are issued to pension committees and sub-committees, and also, indirectly, to county clerks. I want to know whether those instructions are held to have the force of regulations, because if so it would appear that they ought to be laid upon the Table, and if they are not to have the force of regulations then I should like to know whether they have any force at all.

LORD FITZMAURICE : The Question that my noble friend has asked is a very natural one because it relates to a matter which is of very great interest and importance to every authority under the Pensions Act in the country, and is being, undoubtedly, very closely watched and for obvious reasons, by them. Under the Pensions Act, as my noble friend has pointed out, there are certain regulations which are made under subsections 1 to 3 of Section 10 of the Act which deal with a very great number of important matters in the administration of the Act, or at least mainly deal with important questions in the administration of the Act by those authorities. It stands to reason that those authorities, in administering the Act, will incur certain expense, and the question has immediately arisen whether the local authorities are going to be kept in pocket by the Treasury, or whether they, in the first instance, have to bear the pecuniary burden and then, as in other instances, be recouped by the Treasury.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN : Is not that done in a regulation and not by instructions ?

LORD FITZMAURICE : I am coming to that. I am only explaining, in the first instance, what the regulations are. It stands to reason that there must be some method and form in regard to the payment and repayment of these sums, and it is in regard to this matter of the repayment of the sums by the Treasury that these instructions have been given. They are not regulations under subsections 1 to 3 of Section 10 of the Act, and therefore, they do not come within the rule which my noble friend has mentioned, viz., that they ought to be laid before Parliament. But a copy of the instructions is being presented to the other House, and as I have said they deal exclusively with the amount of the administration expenses of the committees, which may be charged against the Votes of the House of Commons, and the manner in which such expenses are to be paid. It is not usual in a case of this kind, which deals with a purely financial matter, for a document of that kind to be laid before this House. That I am informed on high authority. But the instructions are going to be laid before the other House, and at the same time I shall be exceedingly glad, on behalf of the Treasury, to communicate a copy of the instructions to my noble friend, if he desires to see them, at once.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN : The noble Earl has not answered the second part of my Question. As these instructions are not regulations and it is not necessary to lay them as he says on the Table of this House, what force, if any, have those instructions ? They are not regulations under the Act. In what way has the Act authorised the issue of those instructions ; and those instructions, being, as I know them to be, not merely relative to finance, but giving directions not only to pension committees and sub-committees, but also to officials of the county councils, have they any force ?

LORD FITZMAURICE : I was in hope I had made that clear. The Treasury has power to issue instructions under the general power which the Board has in all cases to give instructions of that kind where it is dealing with monies voted by Parliament. The Treasury is the great financial office of the country, and if my noble friend will refer to subsection 4 of Section 10 he will find that the matter is dealt with.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN : But the money is the money of county councils ; it is not public money.

LORD FITZMAURICE : The instructions are drawn up to regulate the repayment to the county councils of money spent in the first instance by them, and, of course, it is entirely to the advantage of the county council to have those instructions issued by the Treasury. The county councils—I am speaking, for a moment, as a county councillor—naturally desire to get the money back as soon as they possibly can, and to be informed at the very earliest day as to what method they are to pursue in order to get that money back.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN: I will not pursue the matter further now, but shall probably take an early opportunity of calling your Lordships' attention to these instructions before they were issued to county councils. I received one myself as chairman of a county council, and I merely wanted to know whether there is any necessity on my part to pay any attention to them.

LORD FITZMAURICE: The answer to that is that the county councils desire to get their money back, and to get it back as soon as possible. It is entirely in their own interests to comply as rapidly as possible with the instructions which have been issued by the Treasury with a view to getting the whole of this matter forward as quickly as possible.

THE DUKE OF NORTHUMBERLAND: Allow me to ask the noble Lord what power has the Treasury to demand advances from county councils. The noble Lord says that these instructions are for the repayment of certain monies spent by the county councils. What I want to know is, what authority the Treasury has to command money to be advanced by the county councils.

LORD FITZMAURICE: I believe the Treasury take the view that the sections of the Act to which I have referred, and the Act of Parliament as a whole, gives them the power of making that regulation, but if either of my noble friends has any doubt on the question he is, of course, fully justified in raising it in this House, and I shall do my best to give him a further reply.

House adjourned at half-past Eight o'clock, till To-morrow, a quarter past Four o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS CIRCULATED WITH THE VOTES.

Conversion of Battleships into Coal-Hulks—Work for the Unemployed.

MR. E. H. LAMB (Rochester): To ask the first Lord of the Admiralty whether it has been decided to give the work of converting the "Agincourt" or the "Ganges II." into a coal-hulk in Chatham Dockyard to seamen and marines of His Majesty's Navy; and, if so, whether, in view of the amount of unemployment in the neighbourhood, the Admiralty can see their way to reconsider this decision so that the work may be performed by local men.

(Answered by Mr. McKenna.) The reply to the first part of my hon. friend's Question is in the negative.

Poor Relief and Old-Age Pensions.

MR. MOND (Chester): To ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer whether persons of the statutory age who are in receipt of Poor Law relief, the amount of which is recovered in its entirety by the guardians from the children or relatives of such persons, are disqualified by the receipt of such relief from receiving old-age pensions.

VOL. CXCIV. [FOURTH SERIES.]

(Answered by Mr. John Burns.) My right hon. friend has asked me to reply to this Question. It is with some others which have arisen under the recent Act, and which involve legal considerations, receiving attention, but for the moment I must ask my hon. friend to let me defer giving a definite answer to it.

Planting of the Interliever Estate.

LORD BALCARRES (Lancashire, Chorley): To ask the Secretary for Scotland what acreage is to be planted on the Interliever estate before the end of the financial year; and what is the estimated outlay and the number of trees to be employed per acre.

(Answered by Mr. Hobhouse.) I am informed that there is so much work to be done in preparing and fencing the area to be planted and the nursery ground and in putting up the buildings to accommodate the staff which will have to be housed upon the spot, that it has been decided not to begin the actual planting this year, but to prepare for a larger area being dealt with next year than would have been possible under the circumstances this year. From ten to twelve men will be employed upon the work. The number of trees to be planted per acre and the cost will vary according to the nature of the ground and the kind of tree planted.

New Planting in Delamere Woodlands.

LORD BALCARRES: To ask the hon. Member for South Somerset, as representing the President of the Board of Agriculture, what portion of the sum of £681 spent last year in Delamere Woodlands was expended on new planting; how many acres were so planted; and what was the number of trees employed per acre.

(Answered by Sir Edward Strachey.) About £178 were spent inclosing and planting new areas containing about twenty-one and a half acres. About 2,900 trees were planted per acre.

QUESTIONS IN THE HOUSE.

Osborne Naval Training College.

MR. WATT (Glasgow, College): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty what is the system of obtaining entrance to the training college for the Navy at Osborne; is it by competitive examination; if so, is that examination open to all the boys of the country or must they obtain nominations before they are allowed to sit; and will he say from whom these nominations are obtainable and to what class of boys they are usually given.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Mr. McKenna, Monmouth, N.): The method of entry into the Royal Naval College at Osborne is fully described in the public regulations, of which I have sent my hon. friend a copy. The examination is not competitive and there are no nominations—the candidates being selected after interview.

MR. WATT: Who are the interviewers? By whom are they appointed?

MR. MCKENNA: They are appointed by the First Lord for the time being.

H.M.S. "Gladiator."

MR. BELLAIRS (Lynn Regis): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether the £54,000 spent on the salvage of the "Gladiator" is to be met by savings on other items; and whether he can now state if the vessel is to be repaired or whether she is to be replaced, as was done in the case of the two destroyers lost this year.

MR. MCKENNA: The question of meeting the cost of the salvage of the "Gladiator" is receiving careful consideration. As regards the other part of the Question, it has already been stated in this House in reply to a Question by the hon. Member for Fareham, that the decision of the future of the "Gladiator" would be come to when the estimated cost of repair was known.

New Destroyers.

MR. BELLAIRS: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty what is the purchase price to be paid for the two extra destroyers which have been bought this year to replace the two destroyers lost by collision; and whether he proposes to provide this sum by savings on other items of the Navy Estimates.

MR. MCKENNA: As the trials are not completed, no statement can yet be made as to the amount of the price, nor how it will be provided.

MR. BELLAIRS: As the sum of money required for these two destroyers together with the repairs of the "Gladiator" will amount to at least over a quarter of a million sterling, will the right hon. Gentleman undertake it shall not be provided out of savings on repairs, which would only create future unemployment?

MR. MCKENNA: I regret I am unable to accept my hon. friend's estimate.

Strikes and Naval Expenditure.

MR. BELLAIRS: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty if he can state the amount of under expenditure caused by strikes, and which, as announced, will now be devoted to hastening the laying down of some of the ships of this year's programme.

MR. MCKENNA: Although it is not yet possible to give the exact figure, it is anticipated that the amount will be sufficient to meet the extra expenditure involved.

MR. BELLAIRS: Cannot the right hon. Gentleman indicate even roughly the amount?

MR. MCKENNA: No, Sir; as I have said, the amount is due to money not having been expended in consequence of strikes, and it is impossible to fix the total.

First Class Cruisers.

MR. BELLAIRS: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty if he can state why the Return of Fleets this year classes the "Blake" and "Blenheim" as first-class cruisers, seeing that they have been converted to the duties of mother ships for destroyers and deprived of all but four 6-inch guns and four 12-pounder guns in their armaments, and have an armament inferior to many foreign third class cruisers.

MR. MCKENNA: As these vessels retained an integral portion of their original armament, it was decided to leave them in the Return.

MR. BELLAIRS: The right hon. Gentleman has not said why they were included in the Return of first-class cruisers. Cannot he create a precedent and degrade them to the third class?

MR. MCKENNA: I shall be happy to discuss the point on a suitable occasion.

EARL WINTERTON (Sussex, Horsham): Could these ships properly be described as first-class cruisers?

MR. MCKENNA: Yes, and they are properly included and described in the Return as first-class cruisers.

*MR. GRETTON (Rutland): Do the Admiralty consider that the armament these ships at present carry is the armament of a first-class cruiser?

MR. MCKENNA: Not the ordinary armament—but nevertheless they may properly be retained among first class cruisers for the reason I have stated, i.e., that they possess an integral part of their original armament.

Army Horses.

MR. BRIDGEMAN (Shropshire, Oswestry): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War if he can inform the House if any result has come of the consultation between his Department and the Board of Agriculture as to the breeding of horses for the Army.

EARL WINTERTON: In view of the great interest felt in this matter throughout the country, can the right hon. Gentleman explain the unprecedented delay?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. HALDANE, Haddington): I am aware great interest is felt in this matter. I am afraid that I have nothing at present to add to the information which I have already given to the House on this subject.

MAJOR ANSTRUTHER-GRAY (St. Andrews Burghs): Is the matter now out of the hands of the right hon. Gentleman?

MR. HALDANE: No, Sir.

Army Pensions.

MR. BRIDGEMAN: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War if he will, as soon as the Old-Age Pensions Act comes into operation, make arrangements for a weekly payment of Army Pensions.

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY TO THE WAR OFFICE (Mr. ACLAND, Yorkshire, Richmond): I have nothing at present to add to the reply which I gave to a Question put on this subject by the hon. Member for the Isle of Wight Division of Hampshire on the 14th instant.

Ammunition Stores.

MR. BRIDGEMAN: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War if he can state what proportion of the total store of small arms ammunition in this country is kept in one place.

MR. ACLAND: The small arms ammunition is distributed over the country in stocks corresponding to local requirements on mobilisation. I do not think any good purpose would be served by giving the particular information required, but I may inform the hon. Member that no very large proportion is stored in any one place.

Traffic in Spirits in Southern Nigeria.

MR. MARKHAM (Nottinghamshire, Mansfield): I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies if he will say what proportion of the revenue of Southern Nigeria was derived during the years 1906 and 1907 from the sale of gin and raw spirits; whether he has any information that these liquors are consumed by the natives alone; and whether His Majesty's Government will consider the advisability of taking steps to provide that a Crown Colony shall not derive a large income from the sale of spirits, seeing that the sale of such liquors are prohibited to all natives in the self-governing Colonies of the Empire.

THE UNDER-SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Colonel SEELY, Liverpool, Abercromby): The revenue derived by the Government of Southern Nigeria from spirit duties (not from the sale of spirits) in 1906 and 1907 was £600,784 and £806,942 respectively, and the total revenue of the Colony in these years amounted to £1,088,717 and £1,459,554 respectively. The Secretary of State has decided, after correspondence with the native races and Liquor Traffic United Committee, to appoint a Committee to investigate the facts on the spot. I may add that the prohibition of the sale of spirits to natives is not quite universal in the self-governing Colonies.

SIR GILBERT PARKER (Gravesend): May I ask if a member of this community will be added to the Commission of Inquiry on this subject as was practically promised?

COLONEL SEELY: What does the hon. Member mean by this community—does he mean this House?

SIR GILBERT PARKER: This country.

COLONEL SEELY: The Committee is not yet complete. I will represent the views of the hon. Gentleman to the Secretary of State, and point out that some indication was given that some appointment of the nature should be made.

Old-Age Pension Regulations.

MR. FELL (Great Yarmouth): I beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer when the Regulations under the Pensions Act will be printed and laid upon the Table.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. LLOYD-GEORGE, Carnarvon Boroughs): The Regulations were laid upon the Table on Monday last, and will be issued this week.

MR. FELL: Will they be in the hands of hon. Members this week?

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: I am told so.

MR. DUNDAS WHITE (Dumbartonshire): Does the Answer apply also to Scotland?

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: I understand

MR. JOYCE (Limerick): Or to Ireland?

MR. Answer was returned.]

Wales and Old-Age Pensions.

MR. D. A. THOMAS (Merthyr Tydvil): I beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer if his attention has been drawn to the hardship inflicted on monoglot Welsh-speaking applicants for an old-age pension in districts in Wales where the pension officer has no knowledge of Welsh; whether any request has been made to him on behalf of the Aberdare District Council, the Glamorgan County Council, and other public bodies to receive a deputation on the matter; and what reply, if any, he has made to such request.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: Yes, Sir, I have been requested to receive deputations on this subject, but I postponed replying to the request because I was at the time considering how this difficulty might best be met, as I have been fully alive to the hardship in the cases referred to by my hon. friend. I am now causing arrangements to be made to supply pension officers in Wales with the services of interpreters in all cases where such assistance is required to enable the officers to communicate freely with applicants.

Court Procedure.

SIR EDWARD SASSOON (Hythe): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to cases of witnesses (especially of the female sex) suffering from extreme nervous exhaustion after standing a considerable time at the bar; and if he would issue an Order giving witnesses and prisoners the option of being seated during cross-examination.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. GLADSTONE, Leeds, W.): I have no authority to issue any directions on the subject, which is one for the discretion of the Court, and I have reason to believe that permission for a witness to be seated is invariably granted if applied for.

Vivisection.

SIR G. KEKEWICH (Exeter): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to the evidence of Surgeon-Colonel Lawrie before the Royal Commission on Vivisection, with reference to a vivisection performed by Dr. Gaskell, now a member of the Royal Commission; and whether, in consequence of that evidence, he will remove or advise the removal of Dr. Gaskell from the Royal Commission, which is now engaged in considering its Report.

MR. GLADSTONE: The Answer to the first part of the Question is in the affirmative. The Answer to the second is that I see no grounds for taking any such action as is suggested.

MR. LUPTON (Lincolnshire, Sleaford): Are we to understand that one who has taken part in a cruel experiment is to remain a member of a Commission inquiring into the cruelty or otherwise of vivisection?

[No Answer was returned.]

MR. CATHCART WASON (Orkney and Shetland): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether, in view of the evidence before the Vivisection Commission that the object of the operation performed by Dr. Gaskell was to enable a respirable anæsthetic to be administered and regulated, he will undertake that in cases where anæsthetics are only partially administered experiments will be confined to such animals as guinea pigs and absolutely forbidden on domestic animals.

MR. GLADSTONE: My hon. friend is, I think, under a misapprehension. In all experiments on living animals which are calculated to cause pain, except those of the nature of inoculations, it is the established practice that the animal must, during the whole of the operative procedure, be under the influence of an anæsthetic of sufficient power to prevent the animal's feeling pain. This applies to all animals, whether domestic or not.

MR. CATHCART WASON: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that a large number of the medical profession are distinctly opposed to these experiments on domestic animals.

MR. GLADSTONE: The whole question is now under consideration.

Beer at Broadmoor.

MR. MARKHAM: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department will he say how many gallons of beer were consumed by the inmates of Broadmoor Asylum during the year 1907.

MR. GLADSTONE: During the year 1907 14,768 gallons of beer were consumed by the inmates of Broadmoor Asylum. This works out at a little less than half a pint per head per day.

MR. MARKHAM: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that, according to the report of the Lunacy Commission, 32 per cent. of the inmates are in that institution owing to drink, and will he, in place of the drink, find some substitute, such as jam or pickles?

Murderers at Broadmoor.

MR. MARKHAM: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been directed to a speech of one of His Majesty's Judges alleging that many murderers were confined in Broadmoor Asylum though perfectly sane; whether he will say whether the decision of the doctor of this asylum as to whether a patient is insane or not is final; and whether no examination either by a medical board or independent medical men is permitted.

MR. GLADSTONE: I have seen a report of the learned Judge's remarks, and I think that the hon. Member has somewhat misapprehended their purport; but I may say in reply to his Question that there are in Broadmoor persons guilty of murder who could not at the present moment be held to be insane, but who must be detained in Broadmoor in pursuance of the Order of the Court so long as there is a serious risk that, if set at liberty, they would relapse into the condition in which they committed the crime. In judging of the mental condition of patients, I rely on the advice of the medical authorities who see them daily, and who have exceptional experience of similar cases, and I should not be assisted by calling in other medical men, who, however eminent, could not have the same opportunities of forming an equally trustworthy opinion; in any case the present mental condition is by no means the only determining factor in deciding whether it is safe to release a man who, in a state of insanity, has committed a grave crime, and who, if at large, might again become dangerous.

Case of Daisy Lord.

MR. JOWETT (Bradford, W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what action he is taking in the case of Daisy Lord; whether he is arranging for her release; and, if so, whether it will be long delayed.

MR. GLADSTONE: I cannot say more with regard to this case than was said in the letter which has recently been published in the newspapers, a copy of which I will send to the hon. Member.

Motor Fatalities.

MR. MARKHAM: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department will he say the total number of deaths caused by motor-propelled vehicles in the United Kingdom during the first six or nine months of this year.

MR. GLADSTONE: I am sorry that I cannot give these figures. The annual Report of the Registrar-General for England and Wales will contain the figures for those countries for 1907, and will probably be ready for publication about the end of this year; and, as my hon. friend the Under-Secretary stated last week, the police have been asked to furnish returns for the period from May to December, 1908, inclusive, of all accidents in streets, roads or public places which have come to their knowledge, caused by motor or horse-drawn vehicles respectively, resulting in death or personal injury.

MR. MARKHAM: Are not reports on all fatal accidents forwarded to the Home Office?

MR. GLADSTONE was understood to reply in the negative.

MR. MACKARNESS (Berkshire, Newbury): Cannot the right hon. Gentleman give the number of cases in the first six months of this year?

MR. GLADSTONE: We are getting the figures in pursuance of a promise given to this House.

Motor Fatalities in London.

MR. MARKHAM: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will state the total number of deaths and accidents to persons caused by motor-propelled vehicles in the Metropolitan police area during the first eight or nine months of this year.

MR. GLADSTONE: The number of accidents during the months January to September, 1908, inclusive, in which personal injury resulted was 2,945. In 105 cases the injuries proved fatal.

MR. CARR-GOMM (Southwark, Rotherhithe) asked if these accidents were not largely caused by allowing omnibuses to travel through narrow winding streets quite unsuitable for the traffic?

*MR. SPEAKER: That is a matter on which hon. Members can form their own opinion.

London Ambulance Service.

MR. COOPER (Southwark, Bermondsey): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether the Report of the Departmental Committee appointed to consider the question of an ambulance service for London accidents has reported; whether the Committee have adopted the scheme of motor ambulances asked for by the London County Council in its General Powers Bill, but places the control and expenditure in the hands of the Metropolitan Police; and whether there is any town in the United Kingdom where expenditure for such an object is not controlled by the ratepayers.

MR. GLADSTONE: The Committee has not reported, and has, I understand, not yet adopted any scheme. Information on the last point mentioned in the hon. Member's Question will no doubt be given in the Committee's Report.

MR. BOWERMAN (Deptford): Have not some of the recommendations of the Committee already been published in the Press?

MR. GLADSTONE: I am not aware of that.

Licensing Bill.

MR. F. E. SMITH (Liverpool, Walton): I beg to ask the Prime Minister whether he can state approximately how many Italian warehousemen, co-operative stores, grocers, confectioners, refreshment caterers, and other similar businesses will be affected by the inclusion of off-licences within the provisions of the Licensing Bill as regards monopoly value, local option, and prohibition.

MR. GLADSTONE: I beg to answer this Question on behalf of my right hon. friend. The Licensing Statistics for 1907, show that out of a total of 25,143 off-licenses, 14,024 were held in respect of premises where other goods besides liquor are sold. This figure would cover the trades indicated by the hon. and learned Member, but I have no information as to the number of off-licences held in connection with each of the trades.

MR. BARNARD (Kidderminster): I beg to ask the Prime Minister if he can state how many licensing benches there will be under the Licensing Bill, the population in the smallest five licensing districts under the 1901 census, and how many parishes there will be with a population under fifty to which the local option proposals will apply.

MR. GLADSTONE: I beg to answer this Question on behalf of my right hon. friend. The Licensing Bill makes no alteration in the number of licensing districts. That number is at present 993. The respective populations of the five smallest districts are 265, 719, 1216, 1217 and 1328. Lastly, I understand that there are 759 rural parishes with a population of less than fifty.

MR. BARNARD: Will an opportunity be given for discussing this matter seeing that it was precluded by the operation of the closure?

*MR. GLADSTONE: I must ask for notice.

Trade Accounts.

MR. LONSDALE (Armagh, Mid.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether any, and if so, what steps are to be taken to give effect to the recommendations of the Departmental Committee which has reported upon the publication of the trade accounts of the United Kingdom.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Mr. CHURCHILL, Dundee): The recommendations of the Committee are now receiving the careful consideration of the Board of Trade and the Customs, and I am hopeful that a decision with regard to them may be arrived at shortly.

Census of Production Returns.

MR. BOTTOMLEY (Hackney, S.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether his attention has been called to the form of Return required by his Department under the provisions of the Census of Production Act, 1906; whether he is aware of the amount of labour and expense that the furnishing of the detailed information asked for involves on the part of manufacturers and others; and whether he will consider the possibility of simplifying the form of Return.

MR. CHURCHILL: The schedules issued under the provisions of the Census of Production Act were carefully considered by the Board of Trade in consultation not only with a General Advisory Committee, but with Special Advisory Committees representing the principal trades of the country, and it is not possible to modify them at the present stage. Having regard to the very large number of Returns in the various trades which have already been received I have no reason to suppose that the obligations imposed by the Act are, generally speaking, found to be unduly onerous. We desire, however, to put manufacturers to the least possible labour and expense consistent with carrying out the provisions of the Act and where any difficulty arises in filling up the schedule every effort will be made to assist manufacturers if they will communicate directly with the Census of Production Office.

SIR A. ACLAND-HOOD (Somersetshire, Wellington): Will the right hon. Gentleman consult the President of the Board of Agriculture as to the form of the Returns with regard to the production of timber and underwood, and will they consider the question of making the area the estate or the rural district rather than the parish, seeing that many plantations extend into more than one parish and it is almost impossible to make the Return parish by parish?

MR. CHURCHILL: I will make it my business to bring the observations of the right hon. Gentleman under the notice of my right hon. friend.

MR. YOUNGER (Ayr Burghs): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that in the case of the brewery trade, for instance, much of the information asked for must be conjectural?

MR. CHURCHILL: I cannot answer as to the particular trades. But every effort is being made to obtain accurate information, and where the element of conjecture intervenes I think it will be made clear in the Return.

Ireland and Army Horses.

MR. MOONEY (Newry): I beg to ask the hon. Member for South Somerset, as representing the President of the Board of Agriculture, whether the Government have yet settled what grant is to be made by the Treasury for the encouragement of horse-breeding for Army remount purposes in accordance with the recent announcements made by Lord Carrington; and, if so, whether he can state what part Ireland is to take in this scheme and what share of the fund is to be allocated to Ireland.

THE PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. J. A. PEASE, Essex, Saffron Walden): No decision has yet been arrived at in this matter, and it is therefore premature to consider any question as to the allocation of the grant.

MR. MOONEY: Will there be a separate grant for Ireland?

MR. J. A. PEASE: The matter is now the subject of discussion between Government Departments; I can say no more at present.

Weir Hospital Charity Scheme.

SIR HENRY KIMBER (Wandsworth): I beg to ask the hon. Member for the Elland Division, as representing the Charity Commissioners, whether the Charity Commissioners, in framing the scheme for the Weir Hospital Charity, assume or allege that the directions of the testator are incapable of accomplishment, namely, the establishment within the parish of Streatham of a dispensary, cottage hospital, convalescent home, or other medical charity with the two freehold properties and the large fund left by the testator for that purpose for the benefit of the inhabitants of that parish and neighbourhood; whether by the terms of the will income only is to be used for the establishment and maintenance of the charity; if so, on what grounds the Commissioners justify their proposal to appropriate £50,000 of the capital and the income of the whole residue of the trust funds to another purpose in another parish; upon what authority, statutory or otherwise, do the Charity Commissioners rely in applying for the benefit of a hospital in another parish and borough, viz., that of Battersea, a fund which was left for the expressed purpose of establishing a charity in and for the parish of Streatham, in the borough of Wandsworth, which parish has a population of 101,628 and an area of  $4\frac{1}{2}$  square miles.

THE PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARY TO THE EDUCATION DEPARTMENT (Mr. TREVELYAN, Yorkshire, W. R., Elland): I must premise my reply to this Question by saying that, as I am no longer responsible for the conduct of the affairs of the Charity Commission, I should not be justified in entering into any discussion on the merits of the proposed scheme of the Commission. The final form of that scheme will have to be settled apart from my opinion. It is proposed by the scheme that a dispensary and also a nurses' home should be established in the parish of Streatham in the two freehold houses left by the testator, but the Charity Commissioners were of opinion that the whole of the charity funds could not properly be applied for these two purposes. It appeared to them that after providing for these purposes some other mode ought to be found for the application of the residue of the funds whether by way of capital or income, and they considered that the best means of attaining the testator's object of benefiting Streatham and the neighbourhood is that for which provision is made by the scheme. It appears to the Commissioners that the benefits reserved for Streatham and the neighbourhood under the scheme are considerably greater than the charity funds alone could provide for.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS : When will the scheme be laid on the Table ?

*MR. TREVELYAN : The scheme is not of a character to be laid on the Table of the House.

SIR HENRY KIMBER : I beg to ask the hon. Member for the Elland Division as representing the Charity Commissioners, whether he will state the grounds upon which the Commissioners refuse to publish the Report of the public inquiry respecting the Weir Hospital Charity or communicate it to the inhabitants of Streatham, who are the beneficiaries under the testator's will, and will they lay it and the evidence and correspondence before the House, or supply a copy to the Member representing the inhabitants of Streatham ; and whether the Charity Commissioners have received any, and what, protests, objections, petitions, or letters against the published draft scheme.

MR. TREVELYAN : The report made to the Commissioners by their Assistant Commissioner of what took place at the Inquiry is confidential, and it is not the practice of the Commissioners to communicate such reports in the way desired by the hon. Member. The Commissioners have received numerous objections and suggestions with regard to the published Draft Scheme, all of which will receive their careful consideration.

SIR HENRY KIMBER wanted to know what was the object of a public inquiry if the report was not to be made public.

MR. TREVELYAN : The object is to inform the Commissioners, and not the public.

*MR. SEAVERNS (Lambeth, Brixton) asked whether as a matter of fact the Trust did provide that the charity should be established within the parish of Streatham.

MR. TREVELYAN : That hardly arises out of the Question I have just answered.

SIR HENRY KIMBER : I beg to ask the hon. Member for the Elland division, as representing the Charity Commissioners, whether the sum of £5,000 which was paid out of the capital of the Benjamin Weir Trust Fund to the Bolingbroke Hospital in Battersea, before any scheme had been published by the Commissioners, was made to secure two legacies from other testators, and, if so, will he state what those legacies were, by whom they were left and the conditions upon which they were bequeathed ; whether the authorities of the King Edward's Hospital Fund who are alleged to have advised union with Bolingbroke Hospital knew at the time of giving that advice of the purposes for which, and the terms upon which, the testator had left his property, and of the directions which he had given for the application of the funds of the charity ; and whether they never expressed any opinion that the wishes of the testator could or could not be carried out in the manner expressed in his will, and never advised that the fund was insufficient for that purpose.

MR. TREVELYAN : The advance of £5,000 was made to secure the promised donations of £5,000 and £900 respectively of which the trustees informed the Commissioners. The authorities of King Edward's Hospital Fund were consulted only as to the best method of employing a gift of about £100,000 for the purposes of a medical charity for the benefit of Streatham and the neighbourhood. The determination of the legal questions arising in the case is a matter for which the Charity Commissioners accept responsibility.

SIR HENRY KIMBER : The hon. Gentleman has not answered my Question as to whether the authorities had expressed an opinion that the terms of the will could not be carried out as provided therein ?

MR. TREVELYAN suggested that another Question should be put down.

MR. ESSEX (Gloucestershire, Cirencester) asked when the £5,000 was paid out.

*MR. SPEAKER: Notice should be given of that question.

Trawling Prohibition Bill.

MR. PIRIE (Aberdeen, N.): I beg to ask the Secretary for Scotland if the Government intend to proceed with all the stages of the Trawling in Prohibited Areas Prevention Bill this year; and, if so, is it intended to refer the Committee stage to the Scottish Grand Committee.

THE SECRETARY FOR SCOTLAND (Mr. SINCLAIR, Forfarshire): My hon. friend accurately describes the wishes of the Government; how far those wishes can be carried out must depend upon the general progress of business.

MR. PIRIE: Have the provisions of the Bill been approved by the Cabinet, or is it merely a Departmental affair?

MR. SINCLAIR: It is a Government Bill.

MR. PIRIE: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that if a certain Motion threatened in another place is passed, it will be impossible for this Bill to become law this year, if at all?

MR. SINCLAIR: Yes, I am aware of that.

MR. PIRIE: And——

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member has already had several shots.

MR. STANLEY WILSON (Yorkshire, E.R., Holderness): When the Second Reading is taken will the right hon. Gentleman see that there is opportunity for full and unfettered discussion?

Irish Intermediate Board of Education.

CAPTAIN CRAIG (Down, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been drawn to new rules recently and unexpectedly issued by the Intermediate Board of Education in Ireland prohibiting pupils who had passed in any grade from examination in the same grade again, no matter whether qualified by age or not; whether he is aware that if proper notice had been given of the Board's intention many pupils would have waited longer before attempting the examination in order to compete for scholarships; and whether, in view of the hardship inflicted by the introduction of the new rule at short notice, he will urge its postponement till after the examinations in 1909.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. BIRRELL, Bristol, N.): The question of deferring the operation of the new rule was discussed by the Intermediate Education Board at their last meeting, and was then postponed for further consideration. I am at present in communication with the Board on the subject, and I hope shortly to be in a position to announce the Board's decision.

Religious Disturbances at Swords.

MR. LONSDALE (Armagh, Mid.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland what were the circumstances which required the drafting of a considerable body of additional police into the town of Swords during the past week; how many constables have been injured; and whether any proceedings have been instituted against those responsible for the disorder.

MR. BIRRELL: It was necessary to send ten extra police to Swords to preserve the peace owing to ill-feeling caused by a religious meeting held by strangers in the village. No constables were injured. Two persons are to be proceeded against for throwing stones.

MR. JAMES CAMPBELL (Dublin University): Is it not the fact the religious services in question were held with closed doors and not the slightest element of provocation; is it the case that on five different occasions the people attending them were molested and the doors of the building wrecked; and were the persons responsible for the outrage well known to the police?

MR. BIRRELL: I cannot answer those Questions without further inquiry. I only know that irritation was caused by the holding of certain religious meetings.

MR. JAMES CAMPBELL: But surely the right hon. Gentleman knows if the meetings were held with closed doors and without the slightest elements of provocation?

MR. BIRRELL: I am not in a position to say definitely.

MR. MOORE (Armagh, N.): Is it not a fact that these evangelical meetings have since had to be discontinued owing to the interference of inhabitants?

MR. NANNETTI (Dublin, College Green): Is the right hon. Gentleman not aware that the most cordial and happy relations exist between the Catholics and Protestants of Swords and that the Catholic priest and Protestant rector worked together in order to prevent disturbances? Have not the troubles now ceased altogether?

United Irish League Courts.

MR. LONSDALE: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that United Irish League branches are holding illegal courts at which intimidatory resolutions are passed, which are afterwards published in Nationalist journals, and acted upon; and whether, having regard to the increasing number of cases of boycotting in certain districts, he intends to take any proceedings to suppress incitements to this form of intimidation.

MR. BIRRELL: The Government are aware that certain newspapers in Ireland are publishing reports of meetings of United Irish League branches at which intimidatory resolutions are stated to have been passed. The facts have already been placed before the Law Officers of the Crown in order that they may consider what proceedings, if any, are called for.

Malicious Injury at Kilrush.

MR. LONSDALE: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that compensation has been awarded at Kilrush quarter sessions to Mr. James Griffin, J.P., for malicious injury to two horses and a mare, which had their manes and tails cut off, and that the evidence in the case disclosed the fact that the claimant was recently shot at and wounded; and whether any persons have been made criminally amenable for these offences.

MR. BIRRELL: I am informed that compensation was awarded as stated in the Question. The injury to the animals consisted in cutting off their manes and the hair of their tails. It is the fact that Mr. Griffin was recently fired at and slightly wounded. No person has been made amenable for these offences.

Royal Irish Constabulary.

CAPTAIN CRAIG: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he can state the strength of all ranks of the Royal Irish Constabulary on the 1st January, 1906, and on the 1st October, 1908, respectively.

MR. BIRRELL: On 1st January, 1906, the strength of all ranks of the Royal Irish Constabulary was thirty seven county inspectors, 204 district inspectors, 235 head constables, and 9,474 sergeants and constables. On 1st October, 1908, the numbers were thirty-seven county inspectors, 195 district inspectors, 241 head constables, and 10,195 sergeants and constables.

CAPTAIN CRAIG: Is this extraordinary increase of the police force in Ireland due to the governing of Ireland according to Irish national ideals.

MR. BIRRELL: I am not aware I am governing Ireland according to Irish national ideals.

MR. MOORE: Did not the hon. and learned Member for Waterford say so in America a fortnight since?

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order.

Leitrim Mountain Outrage.

CAPTAIN CRAIG: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that on the 2nd October last a band of disguised men, who wore crepe and had blackened faces, attacked a process server in the Leitrim Mountains, at a place called Aughacashel, ten miles from Carrick-on-Shannon, and robbed him of his documents and escorted him out of the locality; and what arrests have been made and what sentences passed.

MR. BIRRELL: The police have no information as to any such occurrence.

Broadford Outrage.

CAPTAIN CRAIG: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that on Tuesday night, the 13th October last, a cattle-drive took place off the farm of Mr. James D. Going, Violet Hill, near Broadford, county Clare, when fifty-four head of cattle were driven; and what arrests have been made and what sentences passed on the perpetrators of the outrage.

MR. BIRRELL: The police authorities inform me that the facts are as stated in the Question. No arrests have been made.

Moneygall Cattle Drive.

CAPTAIN CRAIG: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that about the 15th September last a cattle-drive took place (the second within a fortnight) from a farm in the occupation of Mr. George Friend at Army Hill, Moneygall, King's County, when thirty-three sheep were scattered and seventeen cattle were driven to Glenigile, North Tipperary, seven miles distant; what arrests have been made; and what sentences passed on the perpetrators of the outrage.

MR. BIRRELL. The police authorities inform me that the facts are substantially as stated in the Question. No arrests have been made.

Firearms in Ireland.

CAPTAIN CRAIG: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he can state the number of firearms, including revolvers, sold in Ireland since the Peace Preservation Act was dropped by the present Government, to date, and for a similar period prior to 1st January, 1906; and whether, in view of the increase of outrages in which firearms are used, the Government intend to take steps to prohibit the sale of rifles, guns, revolvers, and ammunition to irresponsible persons in Ireland.

MR. BIRRELL: I am not in a position to give the figures asked for in the first part of the Question, nor am I aware of any means by which the Government could obtain precise information on the subject. The Government would be willing to introduce a Bill on the lines of the English Pistols Act if opportunity should offer.

CAPTAIN CRAIG: Will the Government take an early opportunity to introduce a Bill to deal with this serious matter.

MR. BIRRELL: The Government recognise the serious nature of the increase in the number of firings into houses, but the question is how far legislation can effect a reduction.

CAPTAIN CRAIG: Why did you drop the Peace Preservation Act?

Incitements to Cattle Driving.

CAPTAIN CRAIG: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he can state the number and names of hon. Members of this House who have publicly advocated cattle-driving in Ireland during the recent recess; in how many cases did the police take shorthand notes of the proceedings; in how many cases did the Government institute proceedings against them; and how many arrests of persons actually engaged in cattle-driving were made.

MR. BIRRELL: I am not in a position to state the number and names of hon. Members who have publicly advocated cattle-driving during the recent recess. The only case of which I have official knowledge is that of the hon. Member for North Longford, who recently delivered a public speech in which he is stated to have advocated cattle-driving. The speech was officially reported and the shorthand notes are at present under consideration. No proceedings have yet been instituted. During the period in question seventy-three persons engaged in cattle-driving were arrested.

MR. MOORE: Was the speech to which the right hon. Gentleman refers delivered since the same hon. Member was tried for inciting to cattle-driving, the jury disagreeing, and the Government taking no further action?

MR. BIRRELL: Yes; I think that is so.

CAPTAIN CRAIG asked whether the Government considered it fair that the people who acted on the advice of hon. Members should be imprisoned while the instigators went free.

[No Answer was returned.]

Irish Constabulary Bill.

CAPTAIN CRAIG: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he can state the date on which he purposes introducing the Royal Irish Constabulary Bill; and whether he can assure the House that any increase of pay and emoluments proposed will date from the first of the financial year, as in the case of national school teachers.

MR. BIRRELL: I am anxious to introduce the Constabulary (Ireland) Bill as soon as possible, but I cannot at present name a date because, as I explained in answer to a Question yesterday, the Bill cannot be introduced until the necessary Financial Resolution has been passed by the Committee. It is not proposed to make the operation of the Act retrospective.

Ennis Outrage.

CAPTAIN CRAIG: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that about seven o'clock on Saturday night, the 10th October last, an outrage was perpetrated at Caherbullane, near Corofin, by Ennis, county Clare, when three gun shots and five revolver shots were discharged at a man named John Cahill and his uncle Thomas Cahill, some of the pellets striking the former on the cheek and legs; how many arrests have been made; what sentences have been passed on the perpetrators of the outrage; and what reason is assigned by the police for the attack.

MR. BIRRELL: The facts are substantially as stated in the Question. John Cahill was slightly injured, one grain of shot striking him in the cheek and another in the leg. No arrests have been made. It would be contrary to practice to state any suspicions the police may have as to the reason for the attack.

Prosecutions for Cattle-Driving.

MR. MOORE: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been directed to the observations of the Lord Chief Justice at the Clare Spring Assizes, on which occasion the learned Judge, referring to the returns of boycotting presented to him by the police authorities, pointed out that these returns comprised eleven cases which were described as instances of minor boycotting, and that in five of these cases people not only declined to associate with or deal with the boycotted families, but the latter were also compelled to go considerable distances for the necessaries of life; whether the cases of these five families have since been retained on the list of persons boycotted in a minor degree; and will he state in what respects their cases differ from others which are included in the category of serious boycotting.

MR. BIRRELL: During the twelve months ended 31st July last, 1,237 persons were charged with the offence of cattle-driving; 1,058 persons were ordered to find bail to keep the peace, and of these seventy-one were committed to prison for various terms, ranging generally from fourteen days to three months, in default of finding bail. In one case thirty-two persons were tried at Assizes, but the proceedings resulted in a disagreement of the jury.

Scottish Education Bill.

MR. PIRIE: I beg to ask the Prime Minister if, in view of the importance of the measure and the small amount of discussion hitherto in this House, apart from the Committee stage, on the Scottish Education Bill, he will consider the desirability of giving two days for the Report stage.

THE PRIME MINISTER AND FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. ASQUITH, Fifehire, E.): I cannot at present make any statement as to the exact amount of time that will be given to the Report stage of this Bill, but my hon. friend may be sure that adequate time will be allowed.

English Education Bill.

SIR GEORGE WHITE (Norfolk, N.W.): I beg to ask the Prime Minister if he is now able to say definitely whether it is the intention of the Government to proceed with the further stages of the Education Bill as soon as the Licensing Bill has passed through Committee.

MR. ASQUITH: Yes, Sir. That is our intention.

The Motor Car Act, 1903.

MR. MARKHAM: I beg to ask the Prime Minister whether, seeing that the provision of the Motor Car Act, 1903, are habitually broken and ignored by motor-car owners and their servants, he will say whether, in view of the numerous deaths and accidents caused to the public if he intends to introduce legislation providing such penalties as will ensure that the law as enacted by Parliament is obeyed by all classes of the community.

*MR. ASQUITH: I have nothing to add to the Answer which I gave last Thursday to a similar Question by the hon. Member for the Newbury division of Berkshire.

MR. MARKHAM asked whether the right hon. Gentleman was aware that motor-car manufacturers were advertising the fact that cars of 60 or 70 horse-power were being supplied to Members sitting on the Treasury bench; whether under normal conditions these cars were bound to exceed the speed limit; and would he also say the number of Ministers, including himself, who have been convicted during the last few weeks in respect of their cars.

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member should give notice of that Question.

Unemployment—Government Proposals.

MR. ARTHUR HENDERSON (Durham, Barnard Castle): I beg to ask the Prime Minister whether, in view of the amount of suffering caused by the present state of unemployment, he can now state what the Government proposes to do to alleviate the distress, and when a day can be given to discuss the subject.

MR. MYER (Lambeth, N.): Seeing it is obviously unfair that the incidence of the relief rate should be imposed on the poorer districts in which the unemployed now congregate, will the Government consider the desirability of placing it on a broader basis?

MR. ASQUITH: Mr. Speaker, the statement which I am about to make I can only make with the indulgence of the House. I obviously cannot anticipate the legislative proposals which the Government intend to make at the beginning of next session to deal with the permanent causes and conditions of unemployment. I shall not, therefore, to-day attempt to lay down any of the principles which, when the problem itself has to be faced, will of necessity require careful statement and be properly subject to criticism and review. I will only ask the House to accept my assurance—made in the name and on behalf of the Government—that we do not mean to shirk any of the larger issues which will then be raised. For the moment, in answer to the hon. Gentleman's Question, we have to deal with a special emergency—not, as I shall hope to show, unanticipated and unprovided for, but calling for direct and immediate treatment, without prejudice to our ultimate policy. The situation is a grave one. No one is less disposed than we are who sit upon this bench to minimise its dimensions or to dispute its urgency. From causes, some of which are obvious and admitted and others disputable and obscure, there has been brought about—not in this country only, not in this country mainly, but throughout the allied and interdependent areas of the world's industry—a temporary dislocation of the machinery of production; and the result is visible in an increase of unemployment—not, indeed, beyond precedent, but substantially in excess of anything that we have experienced for some time past. There are faint, but welcome, signs on the horizon which encourage the belief that the existing distress, though acute and widespread, may be short-lived. But be that as it may, without attempting any numerical estimate—which at the best can only be a rough conjecture—there can be no doubt, I think, that during the present autumn and winter, if nothing is done, we shall be face to face with a large body of industrious men and women who, through no default of their own, find for the time no demand for their labour in the ordinary market, and who, unless steps be taken, must be compulsorily reduced to idleness and want. Sir, I need not say—speaking for a moment on behalf of the whole House—they have our profound sympathy. They have a right to demand, and it is our duty to give them, something more.

The first, and in some ways the most important, part of the statement I have to make relates to what has been done and is being done by the Government and the local authorities. The likelihood of such an emergency as now confronts us was months ago foreseen. From the beginning of the summer—I may say even earlier—my right hon. friend the President of the Local Government Board has been assiduously urging the necessity of those in authority in the areas of probable distress making special preparations, both in the acceleration of work for which they had already power to raise money, and in setting on foot fresh works of public utility for which new borrowing powers would be required. My right hon. friend has been exposed in these matters to a great deal of criticism, and, I think, to a good deal of misunderstanding, and I want to take this opportunity of saying—and I speak from constant personal communication with him during the whole of this time—that he has been lavish of time and labour. He has sacrificed his leisure—practically, I may say, the whole of his holiday—day and night, week after week, and month after month. He has been, with all the energy which the House knows and admires, putting his whole soul in trying to prepare and provide for the emergency which now prevails. I will not go much into figures, but let me summarise, as briefly as I can, the result of what has actually been done, and is being done. First of all, I will ask the House to compare the figures for the amount of loans to local authorities for works of local utility sanctioned by the Local Government Board in three successive years between the months of June and October. In 1906 the amount so sanctioned was £3,530,000. In 1907 it was £3,589,000—no substantial difference—but in the present year it rose to £4,388,000. In other words, in round numbers there was an increase in the loans sanctioned during those four months to public authorities in the present year of no less than £800,000. But there is a more significant and instructive figure still. I ask the House next to take into account the number and the amount of loans in which the employment of the unemployed in the localities was expressly the object of the application. I take the months between August and October. In 1907 the number of loans falling within that category applied for was five, and the amount of money applied for £3,560. In the same months of the present year the number of applications rose to ninety, and the amount of money applied for to £719,000. That, I think, shows, on the one hand, the growing sense on the part of local authorities of the distress and emergency which they have to provide for, and, on the other hand, an equally strong disposition on the part of the Local Government Board to meet their reasonable requirements. But I must not stop there. On 21st October—within the first three weeks of this month—the loans applied for in the same way on a similar footing, and either sanctioned or awaiting sanction, amounted to £547,000, and there are still on the list to be dealt with—and they will be dealt with, I am certain, with my right hon. friend's usual promptitude—applications for £326,000. Add these figures together and the House will see that, starting from the month of August last and taking the moment at which we are now sitting, a sum of no less than £1,500,000 will have been added to the resources of the local authorities for the purpose of dealing mainly and substantially with unemployment. That is absolutely unprecedented in any previous Parliament. Even so, that does not complete the account. I spoke a moment ago of the acceleration of works under loans which have been sanctioned. Here in London and the Metropolitan area, and largely owing to the advice of my right hon. friend the President of the Local Government Board, there has been or there will be within a very short period, a commencement of works which would otherwise have been deferred to next year or perhaps a later date. I am only taking two or three instances—one, the Water Board and the construction of their reservoir, involving £520,000; another, the Wandsworth Infirmaries, involving £100,000; and in the case of the London County Council—which I am glad to see is moving in this matter, and moving, I hope, strongly—there is a sum which is not at this moment defined, but which, I am sure, will be substantial.

This special provision has been made in the course of this summer by local authorities, with the co-operation and sanction of the Local Government Board, to meet this special emergency, and I will ask the House to observe two things. These loans, the amount of which I have given, have been applied for and sanctioned on a double footing; first, I will not say with the sole object, but with the main and governing object that the large expenditure which is to be so incurred should be the employment of unemployed labour in the localities from which the applications came; and, in the next place, what is equally important—perhaps more important—that the work to be undertaken under the loans sanctioned should be work to be commenced at once, or, at any rate, without the interposition of any avoidable delay, so that the money can at once pass into circulation and become an effective wages fund for the employment of those at present in idleness. The House may ask on what kind of works this very large sum of money so sanctioned and borrowed is going to be expended, and that I think is a very important point. There is the broadest possible distinction, even when you are dealing with a temporary emergency, between spending money upon what I may call made work—work artificially called into existence, to glide over an emergency of the moment, which will leave no permanent result in the interests of the community—and work of real and permanent public utility. The great advantage of proceeding on these lines is that the money borrowed under the sanction of the Local Government Board is expended upon works for which the local authorities, either under their local Acts or under the provisions of the general law, are empowered to spend the money of the rates—on works like sewerage, drainage, street improvements, erection of baths, the laying out of recreation grounds, the provision of installations for electric lighting, and all the various other channels by which, in these days, municipal enterprise finds a productive and fertilising outlet. Although I do not profess to be sponsor—who could?—for the wisdom and prudence which have guided the expenditure of money in any particular case—I have no doubt that here, as elsewhere, mistakes have been made, money has been squandered, a due sense of proportion has not been maintained—yet, if you look, as I hope the House will have the opportunity of doing when the return is presented, through the works upon which this sum of money is going to be expended, you will find that it is substantially work which will inure to the permanent benefit of the community in whose area it is being undertaken.

There is another thing to say as to the cost of these works. The money has been borrowed upon loans of varying duration, but for the most part they are short loans, and the cost of repayment both of the annual interest and sinking fund, and ultimately of the principal, falls upon the rates. Therefore the whole burden of this expenditure—I am not speaking for the moment of the contribution from the Central Fund—in so far as it is defrayed by the sums raised out of loans, falls upon the rates of the localities concerned. I have said already that it is a condition of these borrowings and of works sanctioned under them that the business should be begun at once or without delay. The inducement, or one of the inducements at any rate, held out to the local authorities, and for which they in terms stipulate as a condition of their applying for those loans, is that out of the Central Fund—the fund voted by Parliament at the end of the financial year—the Local Government Board will contribute a sum in respect of each set of works which, roughly, represents the difference between the value of contract labour and the value of the unemployed labour which they are specially designed to meet. It is only in that way, by making good that difference out of the Central Fund, that you can provide a sufficient inducement in some cases—I will not say in all—for the work to be undertaken. It is, of course, further to be observed that these loans, which, as I have said, are a burden on the rate:—

MR. A. J. BALFOUR (City of London) : Can the right hon. Gentleman say what the estimated difference will be ?

MR. ASQUITH : It is extremely difficult to say until the end of the year. It varies between 5 per cent. and 40 per cent. in different places. It is really extremely difficult to say, and I do not believe any figures given at this moment would be of real value or instruction in arriving at a conclusion on that point. It depends, as the right hon. Gentleman will see at once, very largely on the character and quality of the labour that is employed, and upon the extent to which you can resort to the ordinary labour market and get men accustomed to the work to do it or you have to go outside. I made careful inquiry into that question myself, and I cannot say myself, the range is so wide, what the difference will be until we get to the end of the financial year. But I was going to add—not that I complain of the right hon. Gentleman's interruption—that these loans, which in themselves are a burden on the rates, have been and are being supplemented by large voluntary contributions—in Glasgow, for instance, £35,000 ; in Leeds and Manchester no less than £20,000 in each case have been subscribed.

Now, Sir, in view of these facts, which I have recited in the baldest possible way to the House, I think it is impossible to say that the municipalities of the country as a whole have not shown themselves alive to their responsibilities in this matter. It has been suggested, and suggested in various quarters which are entitled to the greatest possible respect, that local authorities should be empowered by fresh legislation to raise a rate, not exceeding 1d. in the £, for the direct employment of unemployed labour. Some such provision was to be found in the Bill introduced by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Dublin four or five years ago, but it was ultimately dropped when that measure was passing through the House. In so far as the proposal proceeds on the view that national assistance—I will not say exactly or even proportionately—ought to be conditional on local activity, it is impossible not to sympathise with it.

I think myself very strongly that we ought to be very careful and chary in giving a contribution out of the Central Fund to a locality which has not shown, in one way or another, its determination to do its best to the extent of its own resources to assist its own local people. But, without going into any question of principle—because we are dealing with a special emergency which calls for special treatment—the Government, after the most careful consideration, and viewing the matter in all its aspects, have come to the conclusion that the circumstances do not call for such a change in the law. I should like to make clear what are the grounds which have led us to that conclusion. In the first place, as far as we are aware, no municipality in this country has asked for this power. They have, as I have shown, been in communication for three or four months with the Local Government Board. They have applied for these loans and got sanction for them on the ground that in their view—I do not say that as the law now stands they were not constrained to take that view—that was the proper method. But they have never suggested that they desired, in lieu of the policy of loans, a policy of rating themselves. On the contrary, the representations which I have received—and I have received a good number from the municipalities, and certainly the leading municipalities—have all been in this sense, that the emergency is such as to call upon the Government to deal with the matter on what they call national lines—that is to say, not to increase the burden that falls on the local community, but, as always happens in these days, to call upon the taxpayer, the central authority, to make good whatever the deficiency may be. But there is a more serious point. We have examined the facts very carefully, and we have come to the conclusion that if you gave this power to rate up to a 1d. it is extremely doubtful whether it would be largely taken advantage of, and, therefore, whether it would really be productive. What we want in these circumstances is money. We do not want an academic declaration on the Statute-book either of a principle or anything else. This is a matter of business, and we want to get money, if we can, from the right source. If you take what is called the distress districts, those in which unemployment really prevails, and exclude London, the total possible yield of a 1d. rate would not exceed £200,000. If you add London, a possible 1d. rate in London—I do not know whether the London County Council would like to levy it, but assuming they did, the yield would be £170,000. That is a total of £370,000.

MR. REMNANT (Finsbury, Holborn): It would realise over £200,000 in London.

MR. ASQUITH: I am told £170,000. Let us call it £200,000 and make the total £400,000, instead of £370,000. But these places are not going to rate themselves both ways. That is quite certain. If they have applied—and the great bulk of the distress districts have applied—for loans, the burden of which as I have shown, in respect of both principal and interest, must be made good out of the local rates, it is not at all likely that they are going to add to that the burden of a 1d. rate in order to provide a comparatively small addition to the resources which would otherwise be at their disposal. Further, I want to deal with this matter as a matter of business, and I can assure the House, and particularly some hon. Members below the gangway who attach great importance to this proposal of a 1d. rate, that I am looking at this purely as a matter of business, and with the sole object of dealing in the best way we can with the emergency we have got to face. You will get a great deal more money for the purposes which are immediately before us in the present winter, for the purposes of the next three or four months, out of your loans than you will get out of a 1d. rate. I have got here a list, which I shall be glad to have printed if the House likes, of twenty-four boroughs which include, I think, almost all the most necessitous and also very large municipalities, like Manchester, Leeds, Liverpool and Salford. If you take these twenty-four boroughs and add up the produce of a 1d. rate levied in each of them, you will find that that comes, roughly speaking, to £63,000. Thus, after allowing for Manchester, which produces £17,000, Liverpool, which produces £18,000, and Leeds, which produces

£8,000, the total produce of a 1d. rate in these twenty-four boroughs would not exceed £63,000. In those very boroughs—I do not say in all of them—some of them have not applied at all—the loans sanctioned or contemplated between June and this present month of October amount to £602,000. In other words, they have placed at their disposal through the machinery of loans for the purpose of dealing with the exceptional circumstances of the country, nearly ten times as much as they would get from the produce of a 1d. rate. And let me add this—a not unimportant fact when you are dealing with this, as I say, as a matter of business, as an expedient to deal with a temporary emergency—that many of these places are places where the rates are already very high. They run up to 9s. 8d. and 9s. 10d. in the £ and, knowing as one does, human nature, and especially rate-paying and rate-imposing human nature, I suspect it would take a very long time before you could induce the governing body of one of these really necessitous areas to add to the burden of the rates for a temporary emergency a comparatively insignificant sum when, by the loan machinery which has been resorted to, they can provide much better for their wants. I have said so much on that point because I know it is one to which great importance is attached, and because it is one on which the judgment of the country ought to be determined, not upon academic grounds, and not upon grounds of dry economics, but upon practical and businesslike grounds. The Government have satisfied themselves that for these three, four, or five months which lie before us you will make a more adequate provision out of local resources to deal with the problem of local unemployment by resorting to the machinery of loans than you would if you adopted a 1d. rate.

The House may well ask, What are the Government themselves doing, and what do they intend to do? Well, first of all, I will say a word about what has been done, or what is going to be done, by the Government Departments, because they have great responsibility in this matter. The Post Office, a very large employer of labour—probably the largest in the kingdom—in addition to various minor reforms in regard to overtime and so on, for the special purpose of dealing with this matter is taking on during the Christmas season, for the extra work which falls upon it at that time of the year—is taking on as it did last year—8,000 men, so far as possible men who are genuinely unemployed, largely obtained through the Central Unemployed Body of London, at wages which, owing to the action of my right hon. friend, have been raised from 20s. to 24s. a week. That may seem a small thing, but it is an important thing as far as it goes; and my right hon. friend, very wisely, if I may say so, has sought to extend the area of action in this matter by taking steps to provide with similar employment for these special seasonal purposes the unemployed in the great provincial centres of population.

Then I come to the War Office. Let us see what that Department is doing. The replacement of the Militia by the Special Reserve has largely increased the amount of military employment in the winter months. A Special Reservist under the new system has only a fortnight's summer camp; but he does six months drill on enlistment, so that if he enlist early in the autumn, as the War Office encourages him to do, he is provided for throughout the winter. The War Office is prepared to take at least 24,000 recruits in the Special Reserve between now and March. We have got 5,000 already, and they are coming in faster, I am glad to say, week by week; and the War Office has decided, very wisely, to widen the choice of the intending recruit by throwing open the Army Medical Corps and the Army Service Corps, as well as the combatant branch, so that they may have a wider area of employment. If you take the lowest rank in the worst-paid arm, the emoluments are 1s. a day in cash, in addition to rations, and in addition to four payments by way of bounty of £1 each. If the 24,000 men whom the War Office want will join, that Department will spend during the winter of this year something nearly approaching £200,000. That is a very substantial addition to the provision made for the unemployed.

Now I come to what is, perhaps, more important—the action taken by the Board of Admiralty. At Portsmouth, Devonport, Chatham, Sheerness, Pembroke, and Haulbowline 2,100 men are to be specially engaged for repair work, which in the ordinary course would not have been undertaken this year. Those who have been previously employed in the yards will have first consideration, and their engagement will terminate on 31st March, 1909. The cost of that is £73,500. Tenders have been accepted for the construction of nine destroyers. According to the programme foreshadowed in the early part of the year these tenders would not have been accepted before the end of November. It is not advisable to disclose the exact amount of money involved, but it may be stated to be very nearly £900,000. Tenders for five unarmoured cruisers have been called for and are due on 5th November. According to the programme these orders would not have been placed until January, 1909. It is now hoped to place them by 26th November, possibly some of them by 15th November. The total of these tenders will certainly exceed £1,500,000 sterling. These orders meaning, as the House will see, £2,500,000 will be placed this year upwards of six weeks in advance of the time originally proposed. Ante-dating the programme in this way by six weeks, and in some cases two months, means that, presumably, £200,000 more will be spent this winter by the contractors in executing the orders than would have been the case under the original programme. These orders will be distributed between the different shipbuilding centres, so that, as far as possible, they may fairly share them.

Now let me come, in conclusion, to the central grant, which is directly paid out of the taxation of the country. Apart from the function to which I have already referred—that of making good, in the case of these municipal loans, the difference to the local authorities between what may be roughly described as contract and casual or unemployed labour—the central fund is applicable to two main purposes. In the first place, it can make grants to localities which are too poor to borrow or to borrow on any adequate scale. There are many such, and we know it is most desirable that where the rateable capacity of a locality is so low and at the same time its congestion of population and of unemployed is so great that ordinary conditions cannot be said to exist, the special fund should be allocated to that particular purpose. Another purpose to which the central fund can be applied is to pay for the employment of labour for purposes other than those for which loans are or can be sanctioned, but which fall within the scope of municipal enterprise. This is largely done by the Central Unemployed Body of London, a body to which I desire to pay a hearty tribute of gratitude and sympathy for the admirable work which it has done in the course of the last three years. We propose to increase the amount of the central fund. It is almost impossible at this moment to forecast with anything like precision what sum will meet the full necessities of a situation which is not yet fully developed. We propose in the first instance to double the amount of the central grant which was actually expended last year, which will bring us at once to an available figure of about £300,000. I do not pretend to predict the future in regard to that; but we are not content with increasing the amount of the central grant. We think a clear case of necessity has been shown for rendering more elastic the provisions and conditions under which it has been distributed. We propose to give the most elastic and most liberal interpretation possible to the character of the work which is to be aided out of the grant. When you are dealing with a special emergency like this, I am satisfied, as I believe everybody who hears me is, that you may stretch the limits which quite properly from a business point of view would be imposed when conditions were more nearly normal. Further, with regard to the special conditions under which this grant is administered, we propose they should be relaxed in two important particulars—first, so as to allow assistance to be given, in proper cases, to persons who have been receiving Poor Law relief during the last twelve months, who are at present excluded; and in the second place—and I think this equally important—so as to remove the disqualification of persons who have been assisted under the Act in each of the last two years. With those three modifications, elasticity in the character of the work and the removal of the disqualification in respect of Poor Law relief and assistance during the last two years, I believe the main objection which has been taken and the main criticisms of the present administration of the grant will be effectually removed.

May I add how much can be done at a time like this, in addition to anything that the Government or local authorities can do, by landowners and well-to-do people in every walk of life, not merely by benevolent contributions, but by anticipating and accelerating work which in the normal course of things would have to wait until a later date to be carried out? The proposals which I have laid before the House on the part of the Government, I need hardly say, even for the purpose of dealing with the emergency in front of us, make no pretence to the character of finality. If and when the necessity should arise we shall be perfectly prepared to consider in what direction and to what extent they may need to be supplemented. But we believe them to be both adapted and adequate to foreseeable needs; I am sure that as we are in the presence of a national misfortune they will not be canvassed in the spirit of Party. Like all expedients of the kind they are little better than anodynes to produce temporary relief, which do not go down to the root of the evil. And we submit them merely as such, and with the hope and the intention that before this Parliament ends its labours we may be able to strike a real and an effective blow at the permanent causes of unemployment.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR, on behalf of the Opposition, thanked the right hon. Gentleman for his extraordinarily clear statement, and asked how soon he proposed to give the House an opportunity of discussing the matters he had brought before them. So far as he was concerned he did not want the day to be fixed too soon, not this week, nor perhaps next week. [LABOUR cries of "Oh!"] He would give his reasons. The right hon. Gentleman had necessarily travelled over a very wide field and had referred to questions of extraordinary interest and intricacy. They would enter on the discussion far better equipped for debate if they were allowed some time to think over the right hon. Gentleman's statement and by Question and Answer to elicit replies from the Ministers concerned which would make them thoroughly acquainted with the proposals of the Government. Therefore, although he was the last person to wish to see the discussion delayed, he thought they ought to be allowed a few days before they approached the most complicated and most important question with which it was possible for the House to deal.

MR. ARTHUR HENDERSON (Durham, Barnard Castle) desired to say on behalf of his colleagues how thankful they were that the Prime Minister had made a clear and definite statement on this important subject. He was not in a position at the moment to venture any opinion as to whether the proposals were adequate or satisfactory, but he would urge the importance of a day being granted for their discussion much earlier than had been suggested by the Leader of the Opposition. The question was of extreme urgency; and on behalf of his colleagues he would urge that Monday next should, if possible, be fixed as the date of the discussion.

MR. JOHN O'CONNOR (Kildare, N.) asked whether in his survey of distressed localities the Prime Minister had taken Ireland into his purview. Had he taken steps to ascertain the amount of unemployment in Dublin, Limerick, Cork, and elsewhere, and would those plans be taken into account in the administration of the central fund.

MR. ASQUITH asked that he should have notice of Questions relating to Ireland. With regard to the date of the discussion, the Government would like to consult the general convenience of the House. He would not commit himself at the moment to any particular day, but he confessed that the inclination of his own opinion was to take the discussion on an early day, because it was obviously a matter of urgency and should be discussed as soon as possible.

LICENSING BILL.

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 4 :

MR. JAMES HOPE (Sheffield, Central) moved an Amendment providing that in the case of old on-licences extinguished under the power of optional reduction, the compensation should be in accordance with the financial provisions, not of the Bill, but of the Act of 1904. He said that when this scheme had taken effect the number of public-houses would be brought down to the level of the wants of the neighbourhood, and now it was proposed to give the justices special power beyond that to reduce licences. If the theory of the Bill was that the scale of reduction would bring the licences down to a proper proportion he submitted that if the magistrates went beyond that on the face of it they should grant those houses the old-standing terms they would have received before this Bill was brought in. On those grounds he begged to move his Amendment.

Amendment proposed—

“ In page 3, line 30, to leave out the words ‘ this Act,’ and insert the words ‘ The Licensing Act, 1904.’ ”—(Mr. James Hope.)

Question proposed, “ That the words ‘ this Act’ stand part of the clause.”

*MR. G. D. FABER (York) said this was a Bill primarily providing for the reduction during a certain number of years of a certain number of licences, and it had always been approached from that standpoint. During a period of fourteen years the total number of licences would be reduced by 30,000, and a certain measure of compensation would apply to them. With regard to the licences coming under Clause 4, which was the clause for optional reduction, it would be well that a different standard of action should be applied. That clause being altogether an exception to the main scheme of the Bill, he put it to the Committee whether the compensation should not

Mr. HERBERT SAMUEL said the section dealt not with the granting of a licence but the renewal of a licence.

*Mr. JAMES HOPE said that the words of the section as they stood would, if the justices thought they had the power, unless modified, enable them to attach a monopoly value during the reduction period to the renewal of an on-licence. The Solicitor-General was redrafting the clause he understood, and he would ask him to make quite clear what the power was.

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR said he did not thoroughly understand what the powers given were. They wanted to know what was meant by the words "new licences under the Act of 1904." The licence granted since 1904 came to an end, was not renewed, and no compensation was to be made. The contract between the justices on the one hand and the post-1904 licensee on the other was finished and complete, and he took it that the new contract was for not renewing the old licence at all. He did not think it ought to be called a renewal; it was a new thing altogether. If he was right in that, then the powers the justices had for the time being with respect to other on-licences, namely, the post-1904 licences, were the same as they had with regard to the licences coming to an end. Suppose the 1904 licence had come to an end, then the new licence thereupon created might carry with it all sorts of new and extremely onerous conditions which they could not put upon the old licence; and what they wanted to know was whether the Government were not merely restoring the pre-1904 powers of the magistrates, plus a certain right to compensation—whether they were giving them not merely their old powers of power; in other words, granting power to deal with pre-1904 licences. That was he desired to have cleared ANS pointed out that line 34 made it clear that the provision referred to pre-1904 licences might be a refusal to renew and this sub-clause did not apply to post-1904 licences at all.

The operative part of this section was line 34, which enacted what the power of the justices would be with reference to pre-1904 licences. With regard to post-1904 licences, if the licence was granted for a term under the Act of 1904 it came to an end, and there was a provision in that Act which provided that any application for a re-grant of a licence for a term should be treated as an application for a new licence. The operation of this sub-clause was not upon the pre-1904 licences at all.

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: Then why not content yourself with saying that the old powers shall be given to the magistrates?

SIR E. EVANS: Well, we will redraft it in that sense.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

*Mr. CAVE said the Amendment he had on the Paper dealt with a matter which might seem a small one, but it was very important to the parties interested. Under the Act of 1904 when a licence was refused, on the terms of compensation being paid, provision was made for continuing the licence until the compensation was actually paid. It was thought unfair that the publican should lose his licence until he had actually got the money, and provision was made in Clause 6 of the Act of 1904 for continuing the licence refused until actual payment of the compensation had taken place. That seemed perfectly fair, and the object of his Amendment was to make the same provision in this clause. A licensee might have his licence refused in April in one year and might not get his compensation until three, six or even twelve months later, and meantime he might have to go without means of livelihood and without his compensation. He had known a case where the firm and a portionment of the compensation had taken twelve months, and he hoped that some provision would be made for meeting this case.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 4, line 3, at the end to insert the words 'and the refusal shall not take effect until compensation has been paid, the licensee

when necessary being provisionally renewed or transferred for this purpose.'"—(Mr. Cave.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

SIR S. EVANS said there was provision in the Act of 1904 dealing with a provisional renewal of a licence, but it had been omitted from this Bill because it was unnecessary under the procedure now adopted. In many cases where a licence was referred to the Court of Quarter Sessions there was an interval of time before Quarter Sessions could deal with it, and there was also an interval before the compensation was paid, and meanwhile the licensee was entitled to carry on business until he actually received the money. But the procedure under this Bill was quite different, and it was intended that in the case of statutory reduction and the other reduction that the matter should be dealt with at the annual licensing meeting of the justices, who would be the final tribunal. Therefore they had not to go to Quarter Sessions. The intention was that the licence should come to an end on the 5th April next succeeding the annual licensing meeting which was generally held in February and March. They had dealt with compensation having regard to these circumstances, and it would be seen that Clause 10, subsection 2 provided—

That was to say that the amount of compensation which was to be received by the person who lost the licence was to be fixed with reference to the 5th April, the date at which it ceased. Therefore it was unnecessary to insert the provision which had been suggested. The hon. and learned Member opposite said that he was not wedded to this particular form of words, and his Amendment was to the effect that the house should be kept open meanwhile. That was a different matter from saying that something in the nature of interest should be paid or an advance made to the licensee. The point raised was whether the house should be closed or not on 5th April and the policy of the Government was that it should be closed on that date as licensed premises. Therefore the Government were not able to accept the Amendment.

MR. F. E. SMITH thought the Solicitor-General would have been well advised to accept the principle of this Amendment even if he had varied the expression of it. What had his hon. and learned friend pointed out? He had with his great experience told the Committee that unforeseen accidents did take place, and where a delay had not been anticipated it had actually taken place and the licensee had not been compelled to close his house. Under the present Bill it was true one or two obvious grounds of delay which existed in 1904, had been removed, but no one would contend that under the Bill the Government were free from all chance of delay. The hon. and learned Gentleman had referred the Committee to a later section dealing with quite a different matter not in any way affording security for the payment of the money. Surely it would save considerable debate and make it clear that no hardship would accrue if words were inserted providing that in case compensation had not been paid the house should not be closed. The hon. and learned Gentleman said he would not do that, and if he refused the Amendment, unless he could show that under no conceivable circumstances could this arise, his action would naturally create a sense of suspicion and discontent, and it would be taken as a refusal to meet an obvious grievance. If there was any method of satisfying them that this contingency could not arise it would be different, but the hon. and learned Gentleman had not shown that this was the case.

*MR. HERBERT SAMUEL said they agreed that there was a possibility of such a grievance arising, although he did not think it was probable. The settlement of the amount of compensation might take some little time, and meanwhile the man's house being closed, if he had no other resources, hardships might arise. The point was one which clearly ought to be met. But the way which had been suggested by the hon. and learned Member opposite was very undesirable, and he would state briefly why. Under the Act of 1904 power was

*THE CHAIRMAN suggested that it would be better to withdraw the Amendment and the question as to whether the extra houses, if extinguished, should be compensated on a higher scale could be raised on Clause 10.

MR. JAMES HOPE said that his argument was that the extra licences stood in a stronger position than the licences statutorily reduced. However, he would gladly accept the suggestion of the Chairman and withdraw the Amendment.

SIR S. EVANS hoped that the Committee would allow the Amendment to be withdrawn. The real truth of the matter was that this subsection of Clause 4 did not touch the question of compensation at all; and he was sure that it would be perfectly competent to discuss the point raised by the hon. Gentleman on Clause 10.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

*MR. CAVE moved to leave out subsection (2). The point he wanted to take bore somewhat on the question debated at a late hour on the previous night, viz., as to the right of appeal. The subsection provided that—

“Subject to the foregoing provision the licensing justices shall have the same powers and discretion (subject to the like appeal) as to refusing the renewal or transfer of an old on-licence as they have for the time being with respect to other on-licences.”

He was rather puzzled to know what the other on-licences were. The reference appeared to be to on-licences other than old on-licences, and therefore to on-licences granted since the Act of 1904. But the on-licences granted since 1904 were granted on monopoly value, and with regard to those granted for a term of years there would be no question of compensation at the end of the term. He could not help feeling that there was some confusion of thought which inspired the drafting of this Bill. He did not know whether this clause did preserve the right of appeal in cases coming within this clause; and he hoped that that would be made clear. Of course, apart from that question, they had the strongest objection on principle to this subsection. There were two things of great importance involved in it. In the first place it took away from Quarter Sessions the power of dealing with those licences; and secondly, there was the alteration of the present scale of compensation. The clause provided that if a renewal or transfer of an old on-licence was refused during the reduction period then compensation should be paid in accordance with the provisions of this Act. He begged to move.

Amendment proposed—

Question proposed, “That the words of subsection (2), down to the word ‘this’ in line 3, page 4, stand part of the clause.”

THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Mr. McKenna, Monmouthshire, N.) said that the hon. and learned Gentleman had put his point so fairly that he almost disarmed criticism. A question of principle, however, was involved in this subsection, and he could hold out no hope that the Government would change their view as to the desirability of giving power to the local justices to deal with this matter. He thought that the clause adequately provided for an appeal.—All that the clause did was to provide that the local justices should have revived to them the same powers and discretion as to refusing the renewal or transfer of an old licence, not necessarily every year but at the expiration of the period for which the licence was granted; but when it did come up for renewal or transfer at the expiration of the period it would then be treated under the provisions of this clause as a new licence. If they exercised that discretion which they had before 1904, then it could only be exercised subject to the payment of compensation. He thought there was no real difficulty in the interpretation of the clause. The House had already decided on the point of principle, that the discretion of the local justices should not be reviewed by Quarter Sessions.

SIR S. EVANS said he did not desire to repeat the argument he had used on the previous night. The intention of had a profound dislike of the scheme of compensation proposed by the Government, and he regretted that any responsible Government should have committed themselves to such an extraordinary perversion of justice as was contained in the section. He thought that in this particular set of reductions—reductions which were entirely discretionary and on a different footing—there should be the freest and fullest compensation. In the particular clause they were now discussing they were going to allow a bench of magistrates to extinguish licences beyond even the scale provided by the Bill.

MR. WALTER LONG (Dublin, S.) said he would not enter into competition with the Solicitor-General on a matter of legal construction, but this was not a matter of legal construction at all. It was a matter of the plain meaning of the English language. If the clause were passed in its present form there could be no doubt whatever that the compensation payable for the licences extinguished beyond the statutory number provided for under the scheme would be the compensation payable under this Bill. If the words of the Amendment were inserted a separate scheme of compensation would be payable. Unless those words were inserted now he believed it would be impossible for the Government to make Clause 10 carry out the necessary change. The discretion given to the licensing justices beyond the statutory reduction was to apply to licences "in any rural parish or urban area," and he profoundly regretted that his hon. and learned friend the Member for Kingston did not move the Amendment standing in his name to leave out these words. In a vast number of cases since the passing of the Act of 1904 licensed property throughout the country had acquired special value. The owners of licensed property in his own county had surrendered licences in order to secure licences which they now had running. These would now become subject to the operations of this clause, and to say that licences of that kind, which had acquired a value they did not possess before, were to be destroyed subject to the scale of compensation payable by the justices under the general scheme of the Bill was very unjust. If the Solicitor-General was right in saying that this proposed Amendment was in the wrong place or form it would be easy to alter the place and form. It seemed to him that the Amendment, if accepted as proposed now, would have the effect they desired. If the Amendment was not made here, it could not be done on Clause 12.

SIR S. EVANS : Yes, it can.

MR. WALTER LONG said he was sure the Solicitor-General would not give an assurance of that kind unless he was confident. If that was so he would not press for the insertion of the words here. It was conceivable that, under the procedure Resolution, they might not reach that part of the clause on which the change was to be made. He thought this Amendment was of the utmost importance, especially with regard to the extra licences which he had referred to as having acquired an additional value, which should not be ignored by the supporters of the Bill.

*MR. CAVE said he did not move his Amendment to this clause, to leave out "in any rural parish or urban area," because it was put down as consequential to an Amendment on an earlier clause enlarging the area for the purpose of statutory reduction. He was strongly in favour of a larger area, but the Amendment was defeated. He agreed with his hon. friend that the Amendment now before the Committee raised the whole question of the scale of compensation. By the words proposed to be omitted the Government were providing that the licences extinguished on the optional system would be compensated at the lower scale. If the clause passed as it stood it would be extremely difficult to argue afterwards the point that the extra licences beyond the statutory reduction ought to be compensated on a different scale. By accepting the Amendment it would not prejudice that question. This was a question affecting not brewers only, but owners of licensed houses of every kind.

prejudice in the locality, and where they could rely upon justice being done. It was for no reason except that of working up feeling in favour of local justices against Quarter Sessions that this provision was inserted.

MR. JAMES HOPE said it might be due to the density of the lay mind, but he did not understand the answer of the Solicitor-General to the hon. Member for Kingston as to the obscurity of these words "other on-licences" in distinction from "an old on-licence." What would be the effect of these provisions in regard to new licences granted under the Act of 1904? The clause said that with regard to the renewal of these licences the magistrates had the same power. These powers under the fourth section of the Act of 1904 were very extensive indeed, and he submitted that if one of these licences granted under that Act came up for renewal the magistrates might attach fresh conditions to it. For instance, if the licence were granted, say last year for a term of three years, and came up under the operation of this Act within two years, it might be in 1910, quite early in the reduction period, the magistrates might well make use of their powers under the fourth section and vary the conditions of granting the renewal and attach conditions as to monopoly value, so that the licence would not be renewed unless these conditions were submitted to. He thought it was plain that that would refer to all licences granted under the fourth section of the Act of 1904. If that was true of them what did this provision mean? It applied the condition to all "on-licences," and the effect would be to give the magistrates powers in regard to them, to attach the same conditions of renewal as they at present attached to new licences under the Act of 1904, and in that way they might even during the reduction period put before the licensees the alternative of being cleared out altogether under the compensation provisions of Clause 10, or having their licences renewed subject to that very monopoly value which the Prime Minister said he did not mean to exact for twenty-one years. He thought that was the meaning of these words and he should like to know if the

Solicitor-General could supply an explanation.

MR. F. E. SMITH (Liverpool, Walton) said that as at present advised if his hon. and learned friend went to a division he should not be able to support him. As he understood it except for the words in this subsection there was no provision even for the grossly inadequate compensation provided for under this Bill, and if this subsection disappeared even that inadequate compensation would be lost. Therefore he had a difficulty in supporting the Amendment of his hon. friend. But on the earlier part of the clause he thought his hon. friend raised a substantial difficulty, which had not been adequately answered by the Solicitor-General. It might be that the difficulty was only due to somewhat obscure drafting, but certainly an explanation had not been forthcoming of the curious method of expressing themselves which the draftsmen, no doubt by the instruction of the Government, had adopted. He conceived that the operative part of subsection 2 was that, subject to the provision at the end of subsection 1, Quarter Sessions should cease to be the tribunal in dealing with these licences, and the licensing justices should be constituted as the tribunal. It would be quite possible to say that easily and simply without any reference to the old on-licence or other on-licences, and he confessed himself puzzled to know what the powers were which would not otherwise have been possessed in respect of post-1904 licences, which were to be given to the magistrates decision under subsection 2 in regard to pre-1904 or old on-licences. If a licence had been granted for three or four years he did not know what power the provision gave which was not possessed under the Act of 1904. It appeared to relate to a different class of licences, and there must be some reason for it.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said he rose to put some points to the Government and also to the Chair with regard to order and the convenience of the debate. In the first place, he hoped before they went further there would the Government was to give a full right of appeal on the point raised by the hon. and learned Gentleman, but if the hon. and learned Gentleman thought that any words would make that intention clearer he would communicate with his hon. friend as to the form of words which might be employed.

SIR E. CARSON (Dublin University) expressed satisfaction with the undertaking of the Solicitor-General that he would accept words to make it clear that there was a right of appeal in the cases mentioned by the hon. and learned Member for Kingston.

*MR. G. D. FABER said that before they let this clause out of the hands of the Committee he should like to say a few words about it. He should like to call attention to the fact that under subsection 2, the licensing justices had the same powers and discretion (subject to the like appeal) as to refusing the renewal or transfer of an old on-licence as they had for the time being with respect to other on-licences. It was strange to call that a full discretion. He should hardly call it a full discretion which limited the licensing justices in one direction, and gave them no power in another. It said that they might refuse, but it did not say that they might grant additional licences. Additional point was lent to this criticism by the words used by the Prime Minister when he introduced this measure, with regard to optional reduction. He said that the Bill gave power to make optional reduction, and that it was a power vested in the authority in addition to its statutory duty, so that they restored, under this Bill, to the licensing authority the discretion which was taken away from it by the Act of 1904, with regard to refusal, renewal and transfer of existing on-licences, and they repealed the provisions of the 1904 Act vesting such power in the Quarter Sessions. With all respect to the right hon. Gentleman the clause which they were now discussing did nothing of the kind. The right hon. Gentleman said that it restored to the licensing authority the full discretion with regard to refusal and renewal, but when they looked at the clause they found that it was restricted entirely to refusal. Therefore, the right hon. Gentleman when he foreshadowed what was going to be done under the Bill did not foreshadow it properly.

MR. McKENNA wished to point out that the words were "refusing the renewal." Therefore, if they did not refuse, they renewed.

*MR. G. D. FABER said the power was limited to further reduction. He was in some doubt, owing to the extraordinary way the subsection was drafted, on another point. Licensing justices had the same powers or discretion as to the refusal of the renewal of an old "on-licence" as they had, for the time being, with respect to "other on-licences." This was most obscure, especially when he considered what were the provisions later on of Clause 20, which were of the most drastic and far-reaching nature. He knew he was not in order in referring to Clause 20 at length. Under that clause the licensing justices might attach all sorts of conditions to the licence, and if those conditions were not complied with then there was no compensation to the publican. The old on-licences might, it seemed to him, under the wording of the subsection, be subjected to those conditions. The wording of the subsection clearly required alteration. On the general question of which was the preferable tribunal, the licensing justices or Quarter Sessions, that was more or less dealt with last evening, and he would not trouble the Committee with it in any detail, but he would like to say that his opinion remained the same, that the best initial tribunal in all the circumstances of the case would have been the Quarter Sessions, and not the licensing justices. The main object of the Bill from first to last seemed to be to find some stone to throw at anybody supposed to favour the licensed trade. Here the body that had been selected was the Quarter Sessions. The reason why the Act of 1904 substituted Quarter Sessions for the licensing justices was that in a matter where there was any feeling in regard to licences aroused, it was much better to remove the settlement of the question from the local to the larger arena, where it would not be swayed by any prejudice in the locality, and where they could rely upon justice being done. It was for no reason except that of working up feeling in favour of local justices against Quarter Sessions that this provision was inserted.

MR. JAMES HOPE said it might be due to the density of the lay mind, but he did not understand the answer of the Solicitor-General to the hon. Member for Kingston as to the obscurity of these words "other on-licences" in distinction from "an old on-licence." What would be the effect of these provisions in regard to new licences granted under the Act of 1904? The clause said that with regard to the renewal of these licences the magistrates had the same power. These powers under the fourth section of the Act of 1904 were very extensive indeed, and he submitted that if one of these licences granted under that Act came up for renewal the magistrates might attach fresh conditions to it. For instance, if the licence were granted, say last year for a term of three years, and came up under the operation of this Act within two years, it might be in 1910, quite early in the reduction period, the magistrates might well make use of their powers under the fourth section and vary the conditions of granting the renewal and attach conditions as to monopoly value, so that the licence would not be renewed unless these conditions were submitted to. He thought it was plain that that would refer to all licences granted under the fourth section of the Act of 1904. If that was true of them what did this provision mean? It applied the condition to all "on-licences," and the effect would be to give the magistrates powers in regard to them, to attach the same conditions of renewal as they at present attached to new licences under the Act of 1904, and in that way they might even during the reduction period put before the licensees the alternative of being cleared out altogether under the compensation provisions of Clause 10, or having their licences renewed subject to that very monopoly value which the Prime Minister said he did not mean to exact for twenty-one years. He thought that was the meaning of these words and he should like to know if the

Solicitor-General could supply an explanation.

MR. F. E. SMITH (Liverpool, Walton) said that as at present advised if his hon. and learned friend went to a division he should not be able to support him. As he understood it except for the word in this subsection there was no provision even for the grossly inadequate compensation provided for under this Bill and if this subsection disappeared even that inadequate compensation would be lost. Therefore he had a difficulty in supporting the Amendment of his hon. friend. But on the earlier part of the clause he thought his hon. friend raised a substantial difficulty, which had not been adequately answered by the Solicitor-General. It might be that the difficulty was only due to somewhat obscure drafting, but certainly an explanation had not been forthcoming of the curious method of expressing themselves which the draftsmen, no doubt by the instruction of the Government, had adopted. He conceived that the operative part of subsection 2 was that, subject to the provision at the end of subsection 1, Quarter Sessions should cease to be the tribunal in dealing with these licences, and the licensing justices should be constituted as the tribunal. It would be quite possible to say that easily and simply without any reference to the old on-licence or other on-licences, and he confessed himself puzzled to know what the powers were which would not otherwise have been possessed in respect of post-1904 licences, which were to be given to the magistrates decision under subsection 2 in regard to pre-1904 or old on-licences. If a licence had been granted for three or four years he did not know what power the provision gave which was not possessed under the Act of 1904. It appeared to relate to a different class of licences, and there must be some reason for it.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said he rose to put some points to the Government and also to the Chair with regard to order and the convenience of the debate. In the first place, he hoped before they went further there would be some explanation from the Government as to the rather cryptic phrase which had puzzled Gentlemen more learned than himself—

“Subject to the foregoing provisions the licensing justices shall have the same powers and discretion (subject to the like appeal) as to refusing the renewal or transfer of an old on-licence.”

Apart from that it seemed to him that this was the proper place in which his right hon. friend the Member for South Dublin could properly raise a question to which he attached great importance, the question whether the discretion of Quarter Sessions might not at all events be retained with reference to the rural areas. It was not the same question that had been raised on the previous day by the hon. and learned Member for Kingston, but quite a different one. He did not know exactly what words were put from the Chair, but it seemed to him that this question could best be raised by the insertion of words after the word “shall” in line 33, so that the clause should run: “The licensing justices shall except in rural parishes.” That would be a convenient way of raising the question his right hon. friend desired to raise with regard to certain questions which especially affected the rural areas of the country. He therefore asked whether the general question would be best discussed on this Amendment or whether his right hon. friend should await a more convenient opportunity to introduce this or a similar Amendment at or near the beginning of line 33. Another point he had to suggest for the convenience of the debate was the point raised by the hon. and learned Member for the Walton division of Liverpool, who had truly said that much as they objected to some parts of this section they did not object to some compensation being given for those licences which were refused at the unfettered discretion of the local justices. They thought the compensation was inadequate, but they also thought the worst compensation was better than no compensation at all. Those were the three points. The first was an explanation of certain words, the second was for the Chairman to say as to what would be the more convenient course for dealing with the rights of rural parishes with regard to licences, and the third was whether, whatever the Chairman’s ruling might be on this particular point, it would not be wiser to have that discussion on this subsection, having regard to the fact that this was the only subsection which dealt with the licences to be reduced.

*THE CHAIRMAN said he put the words down to the word “this” in line 3, page 4. Therefore it would be necessary for the present Amendment to be withdrawn by consent if another Amendment was to be proposed in the way suggested by the right hon. Gentleman. That, of course, was a matter for the Committee.

SIR S. EVANS said he had no objection to that course being taken.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. WALTER LONG, in moving the insertion of words exempting rural parishes from the discretion of the licensing justices, said he desired to raise the question of the application of this subsection to the rural areas of the country. He raised it on this clause, because as had been pointed out, it stood absolutely clear and distinct from the main policy of the Bill. This was the clause which gave power to deal with what had been called the extra licences, and it proposed to take away the power now possessed by Quarter Sessions, and transfer it to the licensing justices of the district. Whatever might be said with regard to the general principle with regard to the large towns and urban areas, the general convenience of the community had been entirely ignored by the Bill. Yesterday the hon. Member for the Appleby division gave a description of certain parts of the country which he said enjoyed great blessings owing to the absence of licences. He had ventured to interrupt the hon. Gentleman by pointing out other districts which were quite as blessed which possessed licences. He was going to submit that their condition was not due to there being no licences. He had in mind a great many rural parishes in which there were no public-houses in the villages and be of a different character. They had a method of compensation ready to their hand which was set forth clearly under the Act of 1904, and which had worked satisfactorily. The compensation that would be provided in cases of optional reduction under the scheme of 1904 would not cost the State a farthing, and would not set up the injustice of which they had had occasion to complain in cases of statutory reduction. If the Government were open to argument at all, if they had not stopped their ears with wax or cotton-wool, he hoped that inasmuch as in Clause 4 they went entirely outside the main structure of the measure they would allow compensation to be given on the liberal and equitable terms of the Act of 1904, and not under the wicked provisions for compensation which were applied to the licences to be reduced under the scheme of this Bill.

MR. YOUNGER (Ayr Burghs) said it appeared to him that the Committee were in a difficulty in dealing with this matter at present, because it was impossible to know how Clause 10 might be dealt with. The experience which the Committee had already had of the astounding changes of view on the part of the Government led him to hope that they might be induced to make Clause 10 a great deal more reasonable than it was at present. Although Clause 10 was unfair, and the compensation under it not at all equitable, they were bound at this stage to do what they could to prevent the licences being abolished on unfair terms. He cordially supported the Amendment.

THE SOLICITOR-GENERAL (Sir S. EVANS, Glamorganshire, Mid.) was understood to say that it was impossible to discuss the question of compensation under this Amendment. The fact that it was not moved by the hon. Member for Kingston, in whose name it stood upon the Paper, rather indicated to him that it was regarded as consequential on an Amendment moved last night.

*MR. CAVE (Surrey, Kingston) said he addressed the Committee on the subject yesterday, and he did not wish to make two speeches on the same point.

SIR S. EVANS said the Amendment was to a great extent consequential. The meaning of the provision in the last four lines of the subsection was quite clear. It was also clear that if they substituted the Act of 1904 they would make absolute nonsense of the whole of that part of the clause. The proviso was intended as an indication to the justices that they might, subject to the financial provisions of this Act, make further reductions in excess of the statutory reduction. He gathered from the speech of the mover of the Amendment that he desired to discuss the question of compensation, but that could not be done at present.

LORD R. CECIL (Marylebone, E.) said it did not follow that this Amendment, whether right or wrong, was necessarily consequential on the Amendment moved by the hon. Member for Kingston last night. Two quite different objects were aimed at in the two Amendments. His hon. friend last night urged that the procedure available under the Act of 1904 should be adopted, namely, reference to Quarter Sessions. The object of the present Amendment was to substitute the scale of compensation available under the Act of 1904 in a particular set of cases for the scale proposed under this Bill.

SIR S. EVANS: That is why I said in answer to the hon. Member for the Ayr Burghs that it was impossible to discuss it now.

MR. YOUNGER: What I said was that it was difficult to discuss this without knowing how Clause 10 would be framed. I expressed the hope that the Government would change it.

LORD R. CECIL said they could only take the Bill as it stood at present. They must discuss this clause now, knowing quite well that they would not be able to go back on the matter at a later stage. The point now before the Committee was one which he should have thought worthy of a more complete answer from the Solicitor-General. He hat the licence ought to be taken away with right of appeal to Quarter Sessions in the one case, and in the other the reference to Quarter Sessions? The difference was infinitesimal. The tribunal which had the approval and commendation of the right hon. Gentleman would be the final tribunal under the first subsection, just as it was under the Act of 1904.

MR. NIELD (Middlesex, Ealing) pointed out that there was a very great distinction between the two cases. In the one case the licence was referred for compensation, and Quarter Sessions had to deal with it. Under the clause the right of appeal to Quarter Sessions was restricted.

Question put, and negatived.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said he should like some explanation of the words in the subsection "as they have for the time being with respect to other on-licences." He formally moved the omission of those words which he did not exactly understand.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 3, line 35, to leave out the words 'as they have for the time being with respect to other on-licences.'—(Mr. A. J. Balfour.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the clause."

SIR S. EVANS said the meaning of the words was this: Wherever, under this subsection, there had been a refusal by the justices either to renew or transfer an old licence, there would be full right of appeal, as there would be in the event of their refusing to renew or transfer any on-licence that might come before them. They had the right to refuse renewal or transfer subject to the fullest right of appeal. He did not say that the words were as clear as they might be, but if there was any doubt the matter should be set right, and he would communicate with his right hon. friend the Member for Dublin University in regard to it.

MR. F. E. SMITH said the Solicitor-General seemed to him to be entirely mistaken as to the effect of these words. The hon. and learned Gentleman said that appeal would survive in both cases, but if they looked at the way in which the clause was drafted it was perfectly clear that the object was not as stated, because it said—

"The licensing justices shall have the same powers and discretion (subject to the like appeal) as to refusing the renewal or transfer of an old on-licence as they have for the time being with respect to other on-licences."

The object of the clause was that they "shall have the same powers," an expression difficult to construe and deal with, and giving powers and discretion with no right of appeal at all. The difficulty which he and many of his hon. friends felt had not been dealt with. The effect of this subsection was that the justices would have the same power in relation to pre-1904 licences as to post-1904 licences. He wanted to know what powers the justices had in relation to post-1904 licences which they did not possess in regard to pre-1904 licences. If, as to pre-1904 licences, under the terms of this Bill the justices had the same powers as for post-1904 licences, then for the life of him he could not understand why it was necessary in this sub-section to express it in this way—

"As they have for the time being with respect to other on-licences."

*THE UNDER-SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. HERBERT SAMUEL, Yorkshire, Cleveland) said the justices possessed powers with regard to post-1904 licences which they did not possess with regard to pre-1904 licences—the power of refusing renewal without a formal reference to Quarter Sessions, though subject to appeal to Quarter Sessions; and these words "as they have for the time being with respect to other on-licences," were emphasised by the words which followed, "and the provisions of the Licensing Act, 1904"—and so forth.

MR. YOUNGER pointed out that this section gave the justices smaller powers with regard to the renewal of an old licence than they now possessed under the Act of 1904. The Solicitor-General had entirely missed the point; it was not a question of appeal at all.

*MR. H. H. MARKS (Kent, Thanet) said the Amendment which he rose to move was in a sense preliminary and if it should find favour with the Committee, would necessitate certain consequential Amendments. He hoped that that might not be regarded as a fatal objection to it, more especially in view of the number and character of the Amendments which the Government had themselves made in the measure, during the time it had been under discussion in Committee. The Amendment proposed to leave out subsection (4), which provides that no appeal shall lie from the refusal of the licensing justices to renew an on-licence where the licensing justices declare that the licence is to be extinguished in pursuance of a scheme for statutory reduction under this Act. The argument in favour of the proposal could perhaps be best and most briefly put by laying before the Committee a statement of what consequences would ensue if this subsection (4) were permitted to remain part of the Bill. The Committee would remember that at present the power to extinguish old on-licences rested with Quarter Sessions. Under this clause the power to extinguish was to be transferred to the licensing justices subject to an appeal to Quarter Sessions. If, however, the justices declared that the refusal of renewal was a part of their "scheme," then, under subsection (4), there was to be no appeal. Apparently under the Bill there was to be publication of the "statutory scheme." was to be prepared and submitted to the Licensing Commission. It might be entered at a later date. But, for all that the Bill said, its particulars were to remain a secret between the licensing justices and the Commission. When it was being prepared, no opportunity was given either to the trade affected or to the community that was to be reformed to protest against its details or to propose modifications, and no notice was to be given of any proposed revision. The reduction of licences was to be distributed over fourteen years. It followed that either in April, 1909, certain licences would be condemned in anticipation, so many in each year and some perhaps thirteen years in advance, while the knowledge as to which these licences were would be imparted exclusively to the justices and certain officials and clerks, or else the "scheme" would give the justices power to select the licences at their discretion as the period went on. The power to revise involved to some extent the power to select for extinction as they went on other licences than those originally contemplated. But during the whole period of fourteen years only the justices and the Licensing Commission were to know what had been determined on. The justices might renew or transfer a licence and stand by while purchases of property were affected, knowing at the time that the licence involved was scheduled for extinction at a certain date. When that date arrived they were to declare the licence extinguished, and their mere statement that its extinction was decided upon under a secret scheme prepared in 1909 was to deprive the licence-holder of any right to appeal. It might be argued that the risk of an

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

SIR S. EVANS said there was provision in the Act of 1904 dealing with a provisional renewal of a licence, but it had been omitted from this Bill because it was unnecessary under the procedure now adopted. In many cases where a licence was referred to the Court of Quarter Sessions there was an interval of time before Quarter Sessions could deal with it, and there was also an interval before the compensation was paid, and meanwhile the licensee was entitled to carry on business until he actually received the money. But the procedure under this Bill was quite different, and it was intended that in the case of statutory reduction and the other reduction that the matter should be dealt with at the annual licensing meeting of the justices, who would be the final tribunal. Therefore they had not to go to Quarter Sessions. The intention was that the licence should come to an end on the 5th April next succeeding the annual licensing meeting which was generally held in February and March. They had dealt with compensation having regard to these circumstances, and it would be seen that Clause 10, subsection 2 provided—

That was to say that the amount of compensation which was to be received by the person who lost the licence was to be fixed with reference to the 5th April, the date at which it ceased. Therefore it was unnecessary to insert the provision which had been suggested. The hon. and learned Member opposite said that he was not wedded to this particular form of words, and his Amendment was to the effect that the house should be kept open meanwhile. That was a different matter from saying that something in the nature of interest should be paid or an advance made to the licensee. The point raised was whether the house should be closed or not on 5th April and the policy of the Government was that it should be closed on that date as licensed premises. Therefore the Government were not able to accept the Amendment.

MR. F. E. SMITH thought the Solicitor-General would have been well advised to accept the principle of this Amendment even if he had varied the expression of it. What had his hon. and learned friend pointed out? He had with his great experience told the Committee that unforeseen accidents did take place, and where a delay had not been anticipated it had actually taken place and the licensee had not been compelled to close his house. Under the present Bill it was true one or two obvious grounds of delay which existed in 1904, had been removed, but no one would contend that under the Bill the Government were free from all chance of delay. The hon. and learned Gentleman had referred the Committee to a later section dealing with quite a different matter not in any way affording security for the payment of the money. Surely it would save considerable debate and make it clear that no hardship would accrue if words were inserted providing that in case compensation had not been paid the house should not be closed. The hon. and learned Gentleman said he would not do that, and if he refused the Amendment, unless he could show that under no conceivable circumstances could this arise, his action would naturally create a sense of suspicion and discontent, and it would be taken as a refusal to meet an obvious grievance. If there was any method of satisfying them that this contingency could not arise it would be different, but the hon. and learned Gentleman had not shown that this was the case.

*MR. HERBERT SAMUEL said they agreed that there was a possibility of such a grievance arising, although he did not think it was probable. The settlement of the amount of compensation might take some little time, and meanwhile the man's house being closed, if he had no other resources, hardships might arise. The point was one which clearly ought to be met. But the way which had been suggested by the hon. and learned Member opposite was very undesirable, and he would state briefly why. Under the Act of 1904 power was given to keep the house open until the compensation was paid, and this had given rise to real abuse. The house to be closed was frequently selected because it was not a very desirable one, and in the interval abuses often occurred and misconduct took place which could not be adequately penalised for the licence was already to be discontinued and compensation was assured. Therefore, the Government must adhere to the view which had been expressed by the Solicitor-General. It had been suggested that power might be given to the Licensing Commission to pay a sum on account pending a settlement of the whole amount. There was nothing to prevent the Licensing Commission doing that now, but in order to meet the views of hon. Gentlemen opposite the Government would undertake when they reached Clause 10 to meet the point.

*MR. G. D. FABER said the publican was going to get beggarly compensation and nothing more under this Bill, and now the Government were actually proposing that this wretched man, the greater part of whose living was to be taken away from him, was to be paid a small sum on account. When the licensed property was taken away, if the Commissioners did not happen to have the money the unfortunate person who was turned out would not get paid his due. In the Act of 1904 there was a specific provision for continuing a licence refused on compensation grounds until the compensation money had been paid over. Surely that was a fair and proper way of dealing with the matter. He could understand that the Government might have a good reason for repealing that particular clause, but that was no earthly reason for not re-enacting it in some just and proper shape. It might not seem a large point in that House, but he was perfectly certain that when the outside public heard that when a licence was taken away, the person concerned was not to be paid compensation money there and then, but only a bit on account, the resentment against the whole measure would if possible be intensified.

EARL WINTERTON (Sussex, Hors-ham) said the Under-Secretary of State

for the Home Department had left the matter most vague, for he had not dealt with the point at all. He would venture to ask him whether he thought it quite dignified to insert an Amendment in a later clause providing that an unfortunate licence-holder dealing with the Government should be paid something on account for being dispossessed of his licence. Really the Government were adopting the methods of usurers. He quite agreed that cases of hardship were not very likely to arise; but they had to look at the unexpected. He did not want to go into a very big question, but everybody who knew what had happened in connection with land purchase knew that there had been considerable injustice to individuals. The grotesque proposal of the Government that a certain sum should be paid on account did not in any way meet the case, and there had been no reason shown why, if an Amendment was to be made, it should not be made here. He ventured to say that it would be much more possible to debate the Bill and evade those muddles and troubles which they had had hitherto if the Government would consider the suggestions made to them from that side of the House. The proposal of the Under-Secretary to amend Clause 10 would not meet a quarter of the difficulty. He hoped the Government would reconsider their decision. Although they agreed that cases of injustice were unlikely to arise, he hoped such cases would be guarded against; but the way this Amendment had been met did not encourage them to believe that the Government wished to treat the publican with ordinary justice.

MR. LYTTLETON (St. George's, Hanover Square) thought there was a real difficulty here. He appreciated what the Under-Secretary had said as to its not being desirable to keep the public-house open for a very long time, but it was equally an injustice and a hardship to take away a man's property and not pay him for it there and then. He did not think the anticipations of delay which had been made on that side of the House were exaggerated. There must be cases of appeal which would often take a prolonged time, and surely it was a plain injustice that during an interval, which might be twelve or eighteen months, a small sum on account should be paid. Directly the compensation money was assessed by any tribunal, the publican was entitled to it. Until it was assessed, under the Government plan, the publican was to lose his home and get nothing. He should himself be prepared to accept a compromise upon the footing that until the compensation money was assessed the publican should remain in possession of the house, and that it should remain open. As soon as it was assessed it should be at once paid to him in full and the public-house be killed. There were two distinct periods. The first, which might be very considerable, was that during which the amount of the compensation money was being determined, and there might be a subsequent interval before it was paid. But until it was determined surely a man ought to be left in possession of his house. When it was determined it should be at once paid.

*MR. HERBERT SAMUEL said the suggestion differed infinitesimally from the Amendment which the Government could not accept for good reasons given. There might be two periods, one during which the amount of the assessment was being determined, and the second, subsequent to assessment but prior to the payment. That second period would be exceedingly short. As soon as the assessment was made there was no reason why the money should not be paid. The only point of substance was with regard to the period between the time the publican was told his licence was going to be taken away and his house closed, and the time when he received the money. The right hon. Gentleman's proposal was the same as that of the Amendment, that during that period the house was to remain open under sentence of death with practically no power of control. He was informed in the Home Office that the experience of the Act of 1904 was that abuses might and did occur in these very instances, and it was a grave error on the part of the Government to perpetuate a system which led to these abuses. He said why the suggestion of the Government should not be accepted.

MR. WALTER LONG thought they ought to press the Government. In an earlier stage of this and the previous debate certain figures were quoted. The Under-Secretary had again exercised the privilege of which Ministers very rarely, in his experience, availed themselves. He had told them that under the administration of the Act of 1904, he had been assured that cases of misconduct occurred which caused the gravest inconvenience, and naturally ought to be provided against if possible. But he had not fortified himself, as was usually the case when these assertions were made, by one single case which he could quote in support of his contention. He was not suggesting that the hon. Gentleman had made a false statement, but it was neither usual nor was it just to make allegations against traders connected with a particular industry in general terms unless they were prepared to fortify the allegation by producing particular instances, and especially to the jury whom they were seeking to convert to their view, that there was in the archives of the Home Office abundant evidence to justify a step of this kind. If they knew neither the number nor the character of them it was impossible to say whether this grave act of injustice was justified. The final answer of the Government was that the operations of this Bill, which he believed to be unjust and unnecessary, were to be brought into force against a publican who had committed no misconduct, who might have no other means of living than that derived from his occupation, and that he was not to be paid anything but some modicum on account, because in certain cases there had been instances of misconduct after it had been intimated that the licence would be withdrawn. Further, the Under-Secretary told them that these cases had occurred under the Act of 1904, and he quoted them as justification of his present conduct. Surely his own contention was that, whereas compensation money should be withheld after the house was closed? The Under-Secretary said there was no means of dealing with the publican in case of misconduct; but he could be prosecuted for misconduct. Was it likely, however, that a man was going to run this risk, the loss of his character, and possibly punishment, during the interval, which the Under-Secretary said might be only a few months? That was no argument. If this was not injustice, there was a new meaning altogether to be given to the word. They were taking a man's property against his will, not because he had been guilty of misconduct, but in the general interests of the community, and they were paying him a price which everybody connected with the trade, and a vast number of those who were not connected with it, believed to be altogether unfair. He had never heard coming from a Government a proposition with less support behind it, nor allegations made with less justification against men connected with a trade. Unless some better reason could be given for this additional injustice in the policy of the Government, he hoped his hon. friend would go to a division, and he should most certainly support him, because he believed without an Amendment of this kind a grave and unprovoked and unnecessary act of injustice would be done.

SIR S. EVANS said the right hon. Gentleman had repeated what had been said over and over again on very nearly every Amendment, that such compensation was grossly unfair. That was not the point they were discussing. He desired to enter his protest against the canon which the right hon. Gentleman laid down as to discussions in that House. Apparently no Minister was entitled to express an opinion gathered from experience unless he gave case A., case B., and case C.

MR. WALTER LONG: The hon. Gentleman did not express an opinion. He said he was informed that cases had occurred.

SIR S. EVANS said a Minister gathered his knowledge both from personal experience and from immediate contact with those whose duty it was to advise him, and he supposed it was in that sense that his hon. friend said he was informed. But he would tell him from his experience, without giving the name of the case, because it was unnecessary, and, indeed, it was common knowledge to everybody who knew anything about the business, that immediately a house had its licence threatened or taken away the conduct of the house became less reputable. He had known cases where licence-holders said: "My licence is going to be taken away," and the result was that people who used to go to a house did not continue to go. That was the difficulty in the way of the Amendment, and he told the hon. and learned Gentleman that the Government could not accept it on that ground Prima facie, when a licence was taken away, it was done in the public interest. If it was to be taken away notice was given as early as the month of February

MR. CAVE said the decision might not be come to in February.

SIR S. EVANS: In February or March. The licensing body would be an important body with important duties to discharge, and they might be depended upon to discharge those duties in the best possible way. What did the hon. Member mean by saying that they would pay over the money when it suited them?

*MR. G. D. FABER said the Under-Secretary had proposed that a bill should be paid on account.

SIR S. EVANS said that was done to meet the objections of hon. Gentlemen opposite. He asked the Committee to consider what would happen. They were to compensate a man who was earning his living. Hon. Member had been speaking in favour of licence-holders rather than of their friends the brewers. [AN HON. MEMBER: There are some of them on your side of the House.] However much the justice might be inclined to do their duty there might be a little delay in the payment of compensation. What was the objection to paying a little of the money on account? If a licence-holder was paid a sum on account it did not matter for the first fortnight or three weeks, or even the first two or three months, whether he was paid in full. That concession was quite fairly made immediately they saw what the object of the hon. and learned Gentleman was. The Government were strongly against the particular Amendment now before the Committee. Immediately a decision had been come to under Clause 1 or Clause 3 to take the licence away, that licence would cease in respect of the premises from 5th April next succeeding. There would be no injustice such as had been suggested. Everybody would do his duty and the money would be forthcoming. He would give an illustration. Every lawyer in the House knew that when it was proposed to take a piece of land for the benefit of the State they could enter at once into the possession of the land after it had been valued by a valuer appointed by the Board of Trade. What happened? The money was paid into Court, and the matter of assessing the value came before a Court or arbitrator. [An Hon MEMBER: He gets interest.] No doubt the individual whose land was taken got interest on the money, but that was a totally different matter. [An Hon. MEMBER: He gets the full market value.] So far as inconvenience or injustice could be avoided by hurrying up the Commission or using the power now possessed of paying something on account the Government were perfectly prepared to meet the desire of the Opposition.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I think the hon. and learned Gentleman must be aware that upon no point has he given satisfaction, even to his own friends, with regard to this matter. The first point is the matter of justice to the individual whom you admittedly are depriving of his living. That is granted, and is not denied. You do not deny that at a given date you absolutely deprive him of his living, and you say he must have compensation for that. Does not common justice suggest that a provision should be put in the Bill which would prevent there being anything between the deprivation of a man of his living and his getting the compensation—good or bad—that you mean to give him? And let me tell the Government and those who support this Bill that the Bill does not on the face of it carry very much popularity; it does not suggest generous and fair treatment so obviously that they can afford to burden it additionally with what every man in the country plainly and manifestly thinks a hardship on deserving individuals. I am not sure that the Government do not admit it, and that the Under-Secretary did not think something would be done. Is that going to be put in the Bill?

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. GLADSTONE, Leeds, W.): My hon. friend said that an Amendment would be inserted.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not ask the Government to draft an Amendment on the spur of the moment, because I notice how unsuccessful they have been on other parts of the Bill. But I do ask for, not the exact words, but the exact provision which they mean to introduce, and the part of the Bill in which they mean to introduce it, and whether they mean to make it applicable not only to the class of licences immediately affected by this Amendment but to all licences affected under the Bill. The second point is a very important one. The hon. and learned Gentleman who has just sat down said they must insist if a licence is condemned in February or March on the house being closed on 5th April, because experience shows that immediately you have told the publican that he is to lose his licence the house becomes an ill-conducted house.

SIR S. EVANS: The right hon. Gentleman may paraphrase what I said, but I am not bound to accept it as an accurate paraphrase. I did not say anything of the sort. I said he becomes more reckless in the management of his trade.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I should think what I said was more in the nature of a translation. But what a light does that cast upon the operations of this Bill. Every licence-holder is to be

MR. HERBERT SAMUEL said the section dealt not with the granting of a licence but the renewal of a licence.

*MR. JAMES HOPE said that the words of the section as they stood would, if the justices thought they had the power, unless modified, enable them to attach a monopoly value during the reduction period to the renewal of an on-licence. The Solicitor-General was redrafting the clause he understood, and he would ask him to make quite clear what the power was.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said he did not thoroughly understand what the powers given were. They wanted to know what was meant by the words "new licences under the Act of 1904." The licence granted since 1904 came to an end, was not renewed, and no compensation was to be made. The contract between the justices on the one hand and the post-1904 licensee on the other was finished and complete, and he took it that the new contract was for not renewing the old licence at all. He did not think it ought to be called a renewal; it was a new thing altogether. If he was right in that, then the powers the justices had for the time being with respect to other on-licences, namely, the post-1904 licences, were the same as they had with regard to the licences coming to an end. Suppose the 1904 licence had come to an end, then the new licence thereupon created might carry with it all sorts of new and extremely onerous conditions which they could not put upon the old licence; and what they wanted to know was whether the Government were not merely restoring the pre-1904 powers of the magistrates, plus a certain right to compensation—whether they were giving the justices not merely their old powers but a new kind of power; in other words, that they were granting power to deal with the post-1904 licences. That was the exact point he desired to have cleared up.

SIR S. EVANS pointed out that the words in line 34 made it clear that the provision referred to pre-1904 licences. It might be a refusal to renew or transfer, and this sub-clause did not deal with any post-1904 licences at all.

The operative part of this section was line 34, which enacted what the powers of the justices would be with reference to pre-1904 licences. With regard to post-1904 licences, if the licence was granted for a term under the Act of 1904 it came to an end, and there was a provision in that Act which provided that any application for a re-grant of a licence for a term should be treated as an application for a new licence. The operation of this sub-clause was not upon the pre-1904 licences at all.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Then will you not content yourself with saying that the old powers shall be given to the magistrates?

SIR S. EVANS: Well, we will re-draft it in that sense.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

*MR. CAVE said the Amendment he had on the Paper dealt with a matter which might seem a small one, but it was very important to the parties interested. Under the Act of 1904 when a licence was refused, on the terms of compensation being paid, provision was made for continuing the licence until the compensation was actually paid. It was thought unfair that the publican should lose his licence until he had actually got the money, and provision was made in Clause 6 of the Act of 1904 for continuing the licence refused until actual payment of the compensation had taken place. That seemed perfectly fair, and the object of his Amendment was to make the same provision in the clause. A licensee might have his licence refused in April in one year and might not get his compensation until three, six or even twelve months later, and meantime he might have to go without means of livelihood and without his compensation. He had known a case where the firm and a portionment of the compensation had taken twelve months, and he hoped that some provision would be made for meeting this case.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 4, line 3, at the end to insert the words 'and the refusal shall not take effect until compensation has been paid, the licence and have his whole capital represented partly by bricks and mortar and partly by the licence. If his licence were taken away, and the compensation due to him was not paid by the date on which his house was closed, his premises would stand idle, because he would not have sufficient capital to adapt them to any other business. Surely this would be grossly unjust. He thought the arguments of the Solicitor-General were extraordinarily contradictory. When that hon. and learned Gentleman first spoke against the Amendment he said it was exceedingly improbable that such a case would ever arise, and he concluded his speech by picturing a terrible state of things if the Amendment were carried—that the public-house would be kept open after the proper period, that there would be disorder and reckless dealing, and that the locality would be reduced to chaos.

SIR S. EVANS said he did not use these words.

MR. COURTHOPE begged the hon. and learned Gentleman's pardon. He thought the word "chaos" had been used by him. At any rate the hon. and learned Gentleman drew a rather vivid picture of what would happen if the Amendment were carried. If the hon. and learned Gentleman were right in regard to the little probability of that case ever arising, why did he not accept the Amendment? Therefore that objection fell to the ground. If the hon. and learned Gentleman was right as to the latter state of things arising, surely the criminal law was sufficient to cope with it. From the experience he had had on the licensing bench he had not found that disorder followed when notice was given that the licence would be terminated. No case of the kind had been given in the course of the debate. He hoped that the Prime Minister, who had now arrived, would take this matter into his own hands and accept the Amendment which his colleagues had refused.

*MR. CAVE said that what he wanted to protest against was not only the delay which might occur while the Licensing Commission was finding the money, but the still longer delay while the compensation [was being assessed and the shares ascertained. It had to be assessed by the Commissioners of the Inland Revenue, who would have to arrive at the hypothetical value of the house if not licensed. That would take time. Then they would have to ascertain under Clause 10 what was proper to be paid to the licence-holder for loss of business. That would take time. Again, the Inland Revenue Commissioners having fixed that, the question would arise as to the division of the amount of the compensation amongst the persons interested. That would have to go to another tribunal—the licensing justices. Further, the clause provided that if any difficulty arose there, the matter might be referred to the County Court. That meant still further delay. The rule, therefore, would be that it would take months after the 5th April before the amount of compensation payable to each person interested could be assessed. The Solicitor-General had said that as soon as the licence was condemned there would be misconduct on the part of the licensee. He had never heard of such a case, and if it occurred it could be very easily met by introducing in the Amendment some provision that if there was misconduct the licensing justices might intervene and close the house.

MR. WATT (Glasgow, College) thought that the principle underlying the Amendment was a very reasonable one. It would be very hard indeed, when a licensee was deprived of his licence, if he were not to get at once the compensation for being deprived of his income from the licensed premises, nor the use of the premises during the time which would necessarily elapse before he got the money. It had been said that if the Amendment were adopted, and the house were kept open, abuses would necessarily follow in the house. In his opinion, if abuses occurred they would not be attributable to the licensee, but to the purchaser of the house who failed to pay the purchase money. The licensee was entitled to get his money at once or interest on the money.

He would also point out that a licensee seldom had any capital invested elsewhere than in the licensed house which he would be able to employ in adapting his premises to another kind of business. He condemned hon. Members for laughing at the proposition that the licensee should be paid at once; but receive only an advance of a small portion of the compensation to be granted to him. With no income from the sums invested in the premises from which the licence was withdrawn and in which his capital was locked up, he would have to live on the portion of his capital advanced, and so reduce the capital he might secure through compensation. Hon. Gentlemen who treated this question in that way had very small consideration for financial matters.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said he hoped the Prime Minister would inform the Committee in general terms the way in which the Government intended to meet this difficulty.

MR. ASQUITH said that he would state the position the Government intended to take when Clause 10 came up for consideration.

TELLERS FOR THE NOES—Mr
Joseph Pease and Master of Elibank.

*MR. H. H. MARKS (Kent, Thanet) said the Amendment which he rose to move was in a sense preliminary and if it should find favour with the Committee, would necessitate certain consequential Amendments. He hoped that that might not be regarded as a fatal objection to it, more especially in view of the number and character of the Amendments which the Government had themselves made in the measure, during the time it had been under discussion in Committee. The Amendment proposed to leave out subsection (4), which provides that no appeal shall lie from the refusal of the licensing justices to renew an on-licence where the licensing justices declare that the licence is to be extinguished in pursuance of a scheme for statutory reduction under this Act. The argument in favour of the proposal could perhaps be best and most briefly put by laying before the Committee a statement of what consequences would ensue if this subsection (4) were permitted to remain part of the Bill. The Committee would remember that at present the power to extinguish old on-licences rested with Quarter Sessions. Under this clause the power to extinguish was to be transferred to the licensing justices subject to an appeal to Quarter Sessions. If, however, the justices declared that the refusal of renewal was a part of their "scheme," then, under subsection (4), there was to be no appeal. Apparently under the Bill there was to be no publication of the "statutory scheme." It was to be prepared and submitted to the Licensing Commission. It might be altered at a later date. But, for all that the Bill said, its particulars were to remain a secret between the licensing justices and the Commission. When it was being prepared, no opportunity was given either to the trade affected or to the community that was to be reformed to protest against its details or to propose modifications, and no notice was to be given of any proposed revision. The reduction of licences was to be distributed over fourteen years. It followed that either in April, 1909, certain licences would be condemned in anticipation, so many in each year and some perhaps thirteen years in advance, while the knowledge as to which these licences were would be imparted exclusively to the justices and certain officials and clerks, or else the "scheme" would give the justices power to select the licences at their discretion as the period went on. The power to revise involved to some extent the power to select for extinction as they went on other licences than those originally contemplated. But during the whole period of fourteen years only the justices and the Licensing Commission were to know what had been determined on. The justices might renew or transfer a licence and stand by while purchasers of property were affected, knowing all the time that the licence involved was scheduled for extinction at a certain date. When that date arrived they were to declare the licence extinguished, and their mere statement that its extinction was decided upon under a secret scheme prepared in 1909 was to deprive the licence-holder of any right to appeal. It might be argued that the risk of as innocent purchaser being injured by taking a transfer of a licence which, to the knowledge of certain people, had only a fixed time to run, would be averted by publication of the "scheme." But the power to revise "schemes" and the obligation to revise them at the order of the Licensing Commission rendered publication a wholly ineffective protection. They published one "scheme," and carried out another. At any time during the reduction period any licence-holder was liable to be told: "Your licence is extinguished and you cannot appeal because our decision is part of a 'scheme.'" It does not matter to you if it was a "scheme" made in 1909 or a revision of that scheme made yesterday. Other people whose licences are refused can appeal, but not you, for you have been selected as a person who is not to have a right of appeal." He submitted that that constituted a great hardship and a gross injustice. For these reasons, he begged to move.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 4, line 7, to leave out subsection (4)."—(Mr. H. H. Marks.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out, to the word 'an,' in line 8, stand part of the clause."

MR. ASQUITH said that so far as he understood the remarks of the hon. Gentleman his objection to this subsection was to the decision of this particular point being left in the discretion of the licensing justices. He pointed out that the scheme and revised scheme had nothing to do with what he might call the process of selecting the victim; it merely prescribed what should be the reduction in a particular area. When the statutory reduction had been applied by a scheme approved by the Licensing Commission to a particular district all that followed was to select, supposing it was shown that there must be some reduction, which of the existing licences should succumb. If the suggestion of the hon. Gentleman that that process might take place in a hole and corner fashion were a lively contingency it ought to be guarded against, but an Amendment to Clause 7 standing in the name of the Solicitor-General would provide against that possibility. That being so, surely of all questions that could be suggested as arising out of the provisions of an Act of Parliament of this kind this question of selecting the particular houses to be suppressed was one most properly left to the uncontrolled discretion of the justices of the district. What could be more irrational than to call upon Quarter Sessions, remote from the area of the house, to discuss whether the Black Bull or the Blue Lion should disappear? It was purely administrative action, and should be carried out by the licensing justices. Under these circumstances he could not accept the Amendment.

SIR E. CARSON thought that everybody would admit that the Bill as it stood was a most extraordinary one. And so far as this subsection was concerned, it showed an absolute disregard for anybody who had any property whatever in these licences. Anyone who was prepared to take away the property of others in the most cruel manner possible would naturally support this Bill. This particular procedure was a most extraordinary one. The justices were to settle the number of licences to be extinguished. That was a matter in which he admitted the licence-holder had only an indirect interest. The Licensing Committee would say how many were to go, and the justices would say how many were to go one year and how many another. This they were bound to do under Clause 7. If the justices refused to carry out the provisions of the Bill, the Licensing Committee had power to go down and see the justices. They would then meet together and take a survey of the houses in the district and select those to be extinguished. This would be done behind the back of everybody, in the magistrates' room. Was that fair? The man whose house was to be extinguished got no hearing at all, neither under the Bill nor even under the Amendment of the hon. and learned Gentleman. What the licensing justices would do would be to go into a room, look at a map, and without one word either to or from the man who was going to be dispossessed, say to the licensee when he came up for a renewal: "No." This was a fantastic operation. The clause destroyed not only the appeal but the preliminary hearing—a proposition foreign to our existing laws and unknown to our jurisprudence. He hoped before the Bill left the House that some effort would be made to give the 30,000 persons concerned a hearing, and that they would not be left to be turned into the street without a sixpence. All he could say was that such a proposal as that in the Bill was a disgrace to civilisation.

MR. YOUNGER thought the Prime Minister had totally misapprehended the point which had been taken by hon. Members on that side of the House. He rather thought that the Amendment to Clause 7, to which the right hon. Gentleman referred was not there for the purpose of meeting the point they now made, but for the purpose of machinery for the extinction of the licences, which those who drafted this Bill had forgotten to provide. The Prime Minister had taken up the wrong point, and had not met the objection raised by the Opposition, namely, that he was taking away licences without allowing the smallest opportunity to the persons concerned to appear, and there was nothing in the Amendment of the Solicitor-General which appeared on the Paper to provide such an opportunity.

MR. TOMKINSON (Cheshire, Crewe) said the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Dublin University seemed to him to be another instance of what was apparently now the very common practice of assuming from any proposed legislation that there would be the most unlikely, the most far-fetched, and the most injurious results. They spoke of them as very likely, if not certain, to accrue. The right hon. Gentleman took the instance of the reduction of licences in a country district, and said the licensing justices would have before them a number of licences together with the statutory reduction which they were bound to make, and that then, without one word of warning or notice, in the most hard-hearted manner they would proceed to extinguish and take away the property of the licensees. He ventured to say, after some experience of local benches of magistrates, that, of course, no such action would be taken by them. The return would be made when this Bill became law and not before. They would have before them the population, its density or otherwise, of the area, they would have the number of licences within their licensing district, and they would have before them the statutory reduction which they would be bound to make under the Bill. He would undertake to say that the justices in every case, if a reduction had to be made, would not only deal with the matter as tenderly as possible, but the licensees whose licences were to be taken away would have as long a notice as possible and as much consideration as possible to prevent hardship.

MR. LYTTTELTON said after what the Prime Minister had stated, if he correctly understood him, the speech of the hon. Member opposite was irrelevant. He understood the Prime Minister to concede the right of the licensee to a hearing. If the licensee had a right to publicity—and publicity was equitable—then of course, he must be entitled to it under the bare words of the section. He saw no such words at all in the Amendment of the Attorney-General. He had conversed with a magistrate of experience the other day, an excellent man, and not a Party man at all, a man who had read this Bill, and who believed that he would have to administer it. Hon. Gentlemen opposite and the Government largely depended upon the goodwill, discretion, and zeal of the magistrates. But his friend told him that the duty cast upon the magistrates of selecting—perhaps from two or three between whom there was no distinction—whose licence was to be taken away, was so odious to him that he would absolutely and positively refuse to discharge it. He did not think a more powerful affirmation of the truth of what his right hon. friend had said could be made. To take away property in the way proposed was contrary to every principle of fairness. It was contrary to English law that a person should not be entitled to be heard before sentence was passed. He asked the Solicitor-General to show the House where the publicity was to come in, and where a hearing was to be given.

SIR S. EVANS said the licensing justices would not be able to take away licences except at the annual licensing session upon application for a renewal. All persons who applied for a renewal must be fully heard in accordance with the provisions of the Acts of 1882 and 1904. They could always appear in open Court and would have the fullest opportunity of laying the facts before the justices.

SIR E. CARSON pointed out that by the section as it stood, before the application for renewal came up at all to be heard the magistrates would have to decide what houses were to be taken. Would the Solicitor-General make clear in the Bill that there was to be no decision at all until the justices had heard all the various persons concerned? He did not see under the scheme of the Bill how anything was to occur except that which he had stated. It was not a question of one licence here or one licence there; it was a question of the whole scheme; and, therefore, if the matter was to be settled on the basis of the scheme, unless they allowed the licence holders to be present when the scheme was being made, and allowed them to be heard, there was no possible way of getting out of it.

SIR S. EVANS replied that when the scheme was prepared it would only deal with the number of licences and not with the names of the licensees.

SIR E. CARSON read the section—

"It shall be the duty of the licensing justices of every licensing district to give effect to this scheme for statutory reduction as approved by the Licensing Commission."

That meant that the number was to be approved by the Commission. How were they to do it? "By selecting the licences to be extinguished for the purposes of the scheme and extinguishing the licences accordingly."

MR. ASQUITH said the right hon. Gentleman had really answered himself. The whole of this discussion was really upon Clause 7, and had no relevance to the subject under consideration. The right hon. Gentleman had begun by saying that the publican or licensee ought to be present at the framing of the scheme, but apparently he did not realise what the scheme was.

SIR E. CARSON: Yes.

MR. ASQUITH: Then the right hon. Gentleman's argument could not be seriously viewed. The scheme settled the number, and it was not until then that any particular licensee could be heard. The Solicitor-General had for long had an Amendment on the Paper to omit the words "extinguish the licences accordingly."

SIR E. CARSON said the Solicitor-General did not propose to omit the words "by selecting the licences to be extinguished for the purposes of the scheme."

MR. ASQUITH said the right hon. Gentleman did not do himself justice.

SIR E. CARSON: Nor do you me.

MR. ASQUITH said that what he had stated was this, that the Solicitor-General proposed to leave out the words "extinguish the licences accordingly," the express purpose being to make the process of extinction incomplete until the licence had been brought on for renewal, and the licensee had an opportunity of appearing before the Court.

MR. NUSSEY (Pontefract) said the procedure would be similar to that under the Act of 1904. The magistrates appointed a committee to investigate, and the houses in their district were ear-marked. The owners of those houses had a chance of being heard and evidence was taken on oath. That was the Amendment which the Solicitor-General had put on the Paper. When the houses had been ear-marked, then there would be opportunity to be heard in Court. That had not been so until the Amendment was put down the day before yesterday, but now it would be so.

SIR E. CARSON: As to the argument of the hon. Member, which had been cheered by the Solicitor-General, he made this offer to him, that he would allow them to retain the procedure under the Act of 1904.

MR. SAMUEL ROBERTS said the subsection applied to on-licences, and his point was that it ought to apply to all old on-licences. The Prime Minister, from his speech, did not intend that the post-1904 licences were to be included in the scheme of reduction, and therefore, a fortiori, there would be no appeal.

MR. ASQUITH said as to the post-1904 licences, he could assure the hon. Gentleman he remembered what he had said, but the proper time to deal with them would be on Clause 24.

Question put.

the statutory reduction prescribed by Clause 1, Schedule 1. The Committee would observe that this Bill would come, or at least His Majesty's Government hoped that it might come, into operation by the 1st of January. The time, therefore, allowed to these bodies was only a period of three months within which to complete this complicated, and as the discussion the Committee had earlier in this debate showed, a most invidious task. These hapless justices were expected to unearth from some source or other elements of information which he believed existed in a very fragmentary condition. He thought he was right, or the learned Gentleman opposite would correct him. They had not the divining rod. The requisite figures to enable them to ascertain the ratio of licences to density of population in each rural parish and each urban area were not available. At any rate, it was not pretended that they were available with any approach to any degree of accuracy. And then they were in view almost of the taking of the new census. That was difficulty number one. Having surmounted this, the justices would have to consider how and where the modifications allowed in Schedule 1 were going to be adjusted, with the object of avoiding the infliction of gross injustice in exceptional cases. That was difficulty number two. These elaborate and anxious studies would have to be undertaken with the fear of the Licensing Commission in the minds of the justices, because this Bill finally invested that Commission with the power of accepting or rejecting these suggested Amendments, so that the local people, with their intimate knowledge of local conditions, ran the risk of having their opinions overborne and overridden by an outside body which would inevitably act to a great extent irrespective of local conditions, and in defiance, so to speak, of the desires of the respective localities, needs and wishes which he ventured to say no Government had any right to anticipate by such stringent, inelastic, and rough and ready rules. Presumably the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Spenn Valley, and the hon. Member for the Appleby Division would be the shining luminaries on that outside tribunal.

SIR S. EVANS: No, no.

*SIR EDWARD SASSOON said he was more than glad to have elicited this disclaimer from the learned Solicitor-General because, competent as they were, no two more bitter partisans could be found to equip a board which eminently required an impartial and a judicial mind to be brought to the solution of the problems coming before them. At any rate the work of the licensing justices would be of a very arduous nature, and he thought that it would be materially and physically impossible for them to complete their task within the specified period. From the nature of the case the scheme would, to all intents and purposes, be a numerical one, that was to say, the justices would have to fix upon the number of houses they had to see extinguished; the selection of the victims of the sacrifice would come after. And in this connection he might recall to the attention of the Committee subsection 1, Clause 44, which provided that the licensing justices should not refuse the renewal or the transfer of any old on-licences under circumstances involving the payment of compensation. It was difficult to conceive of conditions more harassing, because these future victims would be on the rack awaiting their appointed doom, or conditions less calculated to attract the right and the reputable sort of people to undertake the management of public houses. One would think that His Majesty's Government had taken a machiavellian delight in honeycombing their measure with provisions of bewildering uncertainty, and of wearisome ambiguity of interpretation. After all, these were minor and subsidiary objections. What he specially desired to impress upon the Committee was that this clause circumscribed and fettered the powers and the action of licensing justices. Why drag in the Licensing Commission at all? They could know nothing at first hand of local circumstances. Why could the Government not trust these local people not to abuse their powers or to act in a reasonable, sensible and businesslike manner? Here they were minutely prescribing to the local bodies all over the country, the precise lines and conditions upon which they were to proceed in the elaboration of their scheme, whatever attenuation and mitigation the special circumstances of each district might require. He should have thought that the Party opposite would have been the last people in the world to deal such a severe blow upon an important branch of our system of local government. The hon. Member for one of the divisions of Essex last night laid the flattering unction to his soul that the Party to which he belonged was the sole depository of the orthodox creed of national and local liberty. Did he still think that he could advance that claim with any justice, in view of the scurvy treatment meted out to a body of gentlemen who had deserved well of their fellow countrymen? Had they, in any important case, been shown to have acted in defiance of the wishes of the districts with which they were connected? He remembered when they were piloting the Licensing Act of 1904, it was made a great point of that the Unionist Party ignored the position and the authority, and the competence of local justices, and the present Prime Minister, in criticising provisions of that Act, said that there should be an infusion in our local administrative licensing body of a popular and representative element. Could he still say with any approach to accuracy that anything like such conditions had been observed in the framing of the present measure? Instead of a popular and representative element, he offered a body of three gentlemen that reminded one very much of the three tailors of Tooley Street, responsible to no one, nominated by a party administration, having no acquaintance with local wants and local aspirations, sitting in some obscure office in London, and affecting the livelihood and the welfare of large bodies of His Majesty's subjects.

*THE DEPUTY-CHAIRMAN: The hon. Baronet is anticipating the discussion of subsequent subsections of the clause. The question whether the licensing justices should have any discretion in the matter of the statutory reduction was fully debated, and decided in the negative, under a specific Amendment moved to Clause 1 (1). Subsection (1) of Clause 6, which the hon. Baronet is moving to omit, simply says that before 1st April, 1909, the licensing justices shall "prepare a scheme for carrying out in their district the statutory reduction." The submission of the scheme to, and its approval by, the Licensing Commission arise later, on subsection (4) of this same clause.

Sir Edward Sassoon.

MR. F. E. SMITH: Is it in order for my hon. friend to object on the ground that when the scheme is prepared it is to be submitted to another tribunal?

*THE DEPUTY-CHAIRMAN: I do not think that comes under the words in regard to the preparation of the scheme. That question will arise later.

*SIR EDWARD SASSOON submitted, on the point of order, that this subsection being the governing factor which was to determine the nature and the character of amendments to subsequent subsections, it was open to him to refer in general terms to the Licensing Commission under whose heel the opinions and the wishes of the licensing justices were to be placed. By the statutory reduction the Bill had already snatched away from these the discretion they had always possessed as to the advisability of extinguishing or renewing licences; it now went further and deprived them of the freedom to carry out their statutory duty free from outside interference in such manner as might seem good to them. Even in regard to the modifications under Schedule 1, local desires were to be subject to the veto of the Commission. A popular and representative element indeed was the last thing the Government wanted to see introduced into the administration of this measure. They knew it to be so unpopular, so contrary to the mass of public opinion, that they had to coerce the licensing justices by imposing upon them a statutory duty subordinating their knowledge of local wants to the orders of an unrepresentative commission and deposing them if they declined to be over-ruled by the triumvirate. It was because he considered this as an intolerable infringement of local liberties and because of his conviction that the result of this measure would be detrimentally to affect the comfort and the welfare of those who had to resort to the public-houses of the land—a class than whom, or even as much as whom, no other class of His Majesty's subjects had a greater right to the indulgent and considerate treatment of Parliament, that he begged to move the omission of this subsection.

"In page 4, line 20, to leave out subsection (1)."—(Sir Edward Sassoon.)

SIR S. EVANS said the hon. Baronet had delivered a panegyric upon the local licensing justices and in so far as that was justified, and he was not saying it was not justified, it was an argument dead against the Amendment, because what was proposed in this subsection was that that very body whose fidelity and ability the hon. Baronet had commended, should prepare a scheme. The whole question which arose upon this Amendment was whether or not that body, upon whom the duty had been laid under Clause 1, was to prepare a scheme for the reduction of licences. The clause imposed an obligation upon the justices to reduce the licences in the district in which they acted, and the question was how they were to do it. The hon. Member had referred to the Licensing Commission. That was a matter which had better be discussed on subsection 4 of this clause which said a scheme prepared by the local justices was to be submitted to the Licensing Commission. In subsection 1 there was no mention at all of the Licensing Commission. He thought the Licensing Commission was a bugbear in the mind of the hon. Gentleman, but an opportunity would be provided on subsection 4 of dealing with the matter. The sole question which arose upon subsection 1 was whether or not the licensing justices should prepare a scheme. He did not know who the Licensing Commissioners were going to be, but whoever they were he was sure when they were appointed they would perform their duties perfectly well. The subsection imposed upon the licensing justices the duty of preparing a scheme before 1st April, 1909. They hoped this measure would become law certainly before the end of the year, and, although the hon. Member might be thinking of the vast work which would have to be done all over the country, if they distributed that work in the various districts, he did not think there would be any difficulty at all. He had heard no complaint from any body of licensing justices that the time at their disposal between the framing of the measure and the time fixed for the operation of the scheme would not be sufficient. However, that might be, there was an Amendment down in his name which allowed the Licensing Commission to extend the time if special circumstances were brought to their notice.

*MR. YOUNGER said the schedule specified the number of licences that should exist according to the population in particular districts, but of course it gave no information whatever, and the Government had no information worth having as to the effect their scheme of reduction would have or of the scheme which they said the licensing justices were to prepare. He had put a Question to the Prime Minister on 9th March last on this very point, but he was refused any answer on the ground that it was impossible to obtain the tabulated information desired without very great labour extending over a period which would prevent the issue of any such return in time to be of commensurate value for the purpose of discussion on the Licensing Bill. He should have thought there was lots of time between March and now to give all the information they wanted. It was extremely important that they should have had it. Loose statements had been made as to the number of licences to be extinguished under the Bill. The Government had not the ghost of a notion as to how many licences would be extinguished. They were in gross and culpable ignorance on the whole subject and they had done nothing whatever to enlighten themselves or the House. There were all sorts of conditions under which licences might be increased in certain circumstances which they could not tell the effect of and which they did not know how far it might be necessary in the public interest to use. The whole scheme of reduction was simply grabbed in rather an indifferently successful fashion from the Minority Report of the Royal Commission on Licensing, a Report which was thrown at their heads on every occasion when it suited the Government, and which was forgotten when it did not suit their purpose for quoting. But that minority was a very small one indeed.

It only contained one member of the independent panel, and he had yet to learn that Lord Peel, able man as he was, and very respected as he must be by every Member of the House, possessed any very outstanding authority on the subject. He had sat with Lord Peel all the years the Commission did its work and he was most assiduous and careful in everything, but to the last moment on the Licensing Commission there were many questions which Lord Peel never understood, and on the very last day when examining a witness he showed he had not picked up the exact bearing of the questions he was putting after being chairman for three and-a-half years. He was sorry to say that, and he said it only because so much importance was always laid upon Lord Peel's views when it suited the Government and their supporters, though when they ran counter to those of the Government they did not hear much about them. When, for example, he suggested in his original draft Report that to have a prohibitory resolution they should have three-fourths of the electors in a particular district voting for it, and for local management two-thirds, the Government could hardly claim that he supported their proposition on the veto question. So with other parts of the Report Lord Peel originally introduced, the teetotal friends with whom he latterly associated could not swallow this and he had to drop it and sign something quite different. The facts would be found in Hansard, he believed, in April of last year. The preparation of this scheme was a very important duty indeed. Under the Amendment which the Solicitor-General was to propose later, the effect of the reduction was to be considered and reported upon, he supposed by the Licensing Commission. That was a new importation into the clause which made it a little more intelligible and it gave a little more freedom of action than the Government apparently intended originally to grant. It might make all the difference in the world in their preparation of schemes and recommendations, and probably would make all the difference in the world in the decisions of the Licensing Commission. Therefore, when the Prime Minister and other Members talked about 30,000 licences being wiped out they had no more idea than the man in the moon whether it would be 20,000, 30,000 or 40,000. The sooner the people understood that and the Government realised and admitted it the better. The period would be practically only thirteen years, because no on-licences which would be entitled to compensation were to be refused in the first year, so that the whole of this great reduction would have to be compressed into some thirteen years, a very short period indeed in which to effect such a large interference with what might be a necessary public convenience in these various districts. Surely the scheme involved greater difficulties than there was any need to create. He was entirely dissatisfied with it. He objected to it on principle, because it was absurd to suggest that they could by a hard and fast line say how many licences there ought to be in a particular district. They had considered this most carefully in the Licensing Commission, because they all acknowledged that there were too many licences in many districts. He acknowledged it quite frankly now. They did everything they could to adumbrate a scheme under which they could get some sort of numerical relation of licences to population, but they found themselves hopelessly stopped from doing so. When they went carefully into the evidence from many of these districts where there was a large number of licences, they found drunkenness was not extreme. In other cases where they were comparatively few, they found drunkenness much more extreme. In such places as Epping Forest all sorts of arrangements had been made, not for the people who lived there but for those who went there: just as exceptional arrangements must be made in the City of London for people who went there every day but did not sleep there at night; and they found it perfectly impossible, with any regard to the wants of those districts, to propose any consistent scheme which would effect what they desired—a proper reduction of licences in those districts where they acknowledged the need for reduction. The Government had, with probably a great deal less consideration than the Commission had given to the subject, accepted this proposition, and he did not think they were wise in doing so. They would find when the local justices had prepared their schemes there would be very great variations indeed proposed in this hard and fast scheme and that it would not work in many districts to which it was proposed to apply it. The Licensing Commission was given a most difficult task in supervising and advising upon all these reports, and in granting or refusing them, one which it was perfectly impossible for three men to perform without any of the local knowledge or experience of the needs of the district, which was essential in a matter of this kind. For three panjandrums sitting in London to control with any success the operations of an enormous number of licensing benches, and ascertain for themselves in anything like a satisfactory way the varying necessities of these districts was impossible. He would like to see the scheme altered en bloc, because he did not think it could possibly succeed. He believed, moreover, that it would have a totally different effect from what the Government thought it would have, and for these reasons he entirely objected to it.

*MR. CLAVELL SALTER (Hampshire, Basingstoke) said he cordially supported this very important Amendment to a very important clause. They had enacted the fact of reduction; they had now the hardly less important matter of the proper machinery for reduction, and he could not help thinking that on the threshold of a matter so vital to the Bill, the few perfunctory words which the Solicitor-General had vouchsafed to them, and the appearance of the Liberal benches, were an eloquent commentary upon those passionate statements, of which they heard so much, that this Bill had behind it all that was best in the Liberal Party. He entirely agreed with what had been said in general praise of the licensing justices. He had some experience of them and of their methods, and he thought that in the main they well deserved every word of commendation that had been used of them. But it was because he had a high opinion of the licensing justices that he desired to support this Amendment, in protest against the manner in which these clauses proposed to treat them. Discretion and responsibility must always go together, and no doubt responsibility often carried with it odium, and much that was unpleasant. But his objection to this clause was that it treated the licensing justices with the utmost injustice, in taking from them all real discretion and leaving them exposed to the bitterest odium and dislike, which they could stand if they had the discretion, but which without it was very hard to bear.

MR. McKENNA: You are dealing with subsection (1)?

*MR. CLAVELL SALTER said he was dealing with subsection (1), but he was sure that the narrowest critic of technical points of order would not object to his saying that he was opposed to this plan of making the justices prepare a scheme and select the victims, because it was obvious that the authority which did the one must do the other. The licensing justices must prepare this scheme whether they liked it or not; whether they thought a reduction was necessary or not. Having prepared it, they must consider it and reconsider it on the orders of the Commission, and if the Commission thought fit to alter it they were helpless. The only thing in which discretion was given to the justices was in the selection of those licence-holders whose livelihood should be taken away without any reasonable or real compensation. He ventured to think that the licence-holder who found his livelihood taken from him would turn the brunt of his indignation not so much on Parliament which had passed this Bill, or even upon the Licensing Commission who insisted on certain reductions, as on these justices who had selected him as a victim to be destroyed. It was treating the justices with the greatest injustice to leave them no real discretion as to whether or not they would reduce, while they would be exposed, being men living in the place, among their neighbours to the bitter odium and dislike which must attend this selection of those who should be destroyed and ruined. On these grounds he strongly supported the Amendment.

MR. F. E. SMITH said he also desired to support the Amendment which his hon.

friend had moved, and he was not intimidated by the signs of enthusiasm on certain of the benches opposite. If one considered this Bill as a harmonious whole, as a measure which, though lengthy, was one of perfect draftsmanship, he should feel some objection to supporting the Amendment of his hon. friend, because he would feel that he was spoiling the artistic value of the Bill of the Government. But having regard to the fact that there was hardly a single clause, so far, that the Government were not pledged to alter before the Report stage, he felt that he could support this Amendment without interference with the artistic merits of the Bill. Under these circumstances he had no hesitation at all in falling back upon the mere ground of merit in claiming some support for the Amendment of his hon. friend. What was the position as it stood at present? It was quite true that in the earlier clauses a certain scheme of reduction had already received the approval of the Committee, and could not be discussed by him at the present moment. The proposal before the House now dealt with the machinery by which the already approved scheme of reduction was to be carried out. He ventured to press upon the Government some argument in favour of his hon. friend's Amendment, which he thought was worthy of serious consideration. Four years ago, when the Licensing Bill was being discussed, hon. Gentlemen were extremely eloquent on the importance of the functions discharged by the licensing justices and the iniquity of interfering with them. It was not interfering with them by sending them to three esteemed strangers in London but to their own district, and the late Prime Minister, Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman, spoke of the undesirability of taking this decision from an able body of men and placing it in the hands of another body of men at a distance. This afforded the strongest argument in favour of the Amendment of his hon. friend. If they took subsection (3) of Clause 1 they would find that even there the activity of the Licensing Commission commenced, because it was to the effect that, if it appeared to that body that the grant of any new licence had been confirmed in contravention of the section, they should declare that that licence was invalid. As they went on in the Bill they would find that it was not the licensing justices who counted, but the Commission in London. When they came to Clause 6, which they were discussing, here again the permission of the Licensing Commission was necessary before the licensing justices might give an auxiliary licence. He put it whether it was not a great mistake to maintain in this Bill relics of the past. Why have licensing justices at all? Was it not worth considering in the stage which they had reached, whether the scheme should not be prepared by the Licensing Commission so that the duties of the local justices, merely nominal now, should be extinguished. They would then know that they had descended to a bureaucratic age and got rid of those who had discharged these duties for many generations. Why not get rid of the already confusing inconsistencies of the Bill under which the licensing justices did one thing and the Commission might refuse it, and the Commission did one thing and the licensing justices started a counter memorial? Why not start a Licensing Commission and say they should prepare a scheme, and when they had prepared it say there should be an appeal to the Licensing Commission, and they should decide whether the scheme was a good one? How admirable would be such an Amendment, and why should they expose the local justices to the indignity of being mere puppets to a bureaucracy in the City of London, who knew nothing of the locality and only interfered in the decision so far as they might be supposed to be ready to take a partisan Act for the political Government of the day?

MR. JAMES HOPE said that until this Bill he always looked upon the office of justice of the peace as one of honour and dignity and of legitimate ambition. He believed that view was shared by many of the supporters of the Government, who in consequence caused some embarrassment to the head of the law in making a selection and in not overcrowding the benches from which justice in petty sessions was administered. He could only suppose that this particular provision was brought in to obviate any such embarrassment.

dignified and responsible work for all these centuries, was to be cut down to nothing and no responsibility or dignity to be attached to it, it was not likely that men would be desirous of sitting on the magistrates' bench.

*THE DEPUTY-CHAIRMAN pointed out that the Committee had already decided in Clause 1 of the Bill that the statutory reduction of the licences should be made by the licensing justices. The Amendment now before the House was very limited in scope. The duty of the justices in this matter had already been decided, and the discussion now must be limited to the point that a scheme shall be prepared.

EARL WINTERTON, on the point of order, asked whether it would not be in order to discuss this point, having regard to the fact that the scheme must refer to particular houses.

*THE DEPUTY-CHAIRMAN reiterated that this was a scheme for carrying out the statutory reduction; that duty was placed upon the justices, and that being so, the decision to which he referred in Clause 1 applied to this subsection so far as the discretion of the licensing justices was concerned. What the scheme should contain was the subject matter of the next subsection.

*MR. CLAVELL SALTER asked whether it would not be in order, notwithstanding the fact that the reduction had been decided, to contend that the justices should not be made the vehicle.

*MR. LEIF JONES (Westmoreland, Appleby) asked whether the justices had not already in Section 1 been made the vehicle for carrying out the statutory reduction.

*MR. CLAVELL SALTER pointed out that Section 1 said that the justices should reduce the licences; it did not say there should be a scheme—that the justices should prepare a scheme or anything of that kind.

*THE DEPUTY-CHAIRMAN said he had already pointed out that the discretion of the licensing justices, as regards the statutory reduction, had been negatived in an Amendment moved to Clause 1. The duty to prepare a scheme was a necessary consequence, so far as the matter of discretion was concerned.

VISCOUNT MORPETH said in that case he was afraid he had not made himself quite clear. The amount of the statutory reduction was decided by Clause 1, but under that clause there was a certain amount of discretion allowed both under subsection 1 and subsection 2.

*THE DEPUTY-CHAIRMAN said that there was no discretion allowed to the licensing justices under Clause 1 which dealt with the statutory reduction. The present Amendment only dealt with the duty to prepare the scheme for carrying out the statutory reduction, and the noble Lord must limit his arguments to the Amendment before the Committee.

VISCOUNT MORPETH said the point was that the magistrates should produce a scheme, and in that scheme they should say what was desirable, whether more houses should exist in particular districts, having regard to the fact that they were touring or market districts or exceptional districts of that kind. That discretion was of a very attenuated character, and if that were now taken away it would be impossible to get anybody of weight or authority to sit and determine matters of that kind. Not only was it a very fine distinction, but it was controlled and trammelled by the fact that there was a Licensing Committee which could upset all their decisions. They all knew that the machinery was extremely slow. The local authority sent up the recommendation to the Department in London, and the Department sent down an official to make inquiry. Suppose that the opinion of the official was different from that of the magistrates who had used their discretion, then the matter was left to the Commission in London, who had no knowledge of their own as to the special circumstances of the locality, and were dependent solely and entirely on the official whom they had sent down over the heads of the magistrates.

*THE DEPUTY-CHAIRMAN said the noble Lord must confine himself to the subsection under consideration, and he must not discuss the subsections which follow.

VISCOUNT MORPETH said his point was that the magistrates had little power because the matters left in their discretion were very limited, and further they could be overridden by somebody else. The difficulty in this matter was that the Government were prepared to trust nobody. The discretion of the magistrates seemed to be a discretion in which it was left to somebody else to say "Yes" or "No." The Government had taken the whole of the power out of the hands of these persons whom they would not trust, in order to concentrate it in the hands of two or three officials in London.

SIR F. BANBURY (City of London) said he was rather surprised, in view of the very excellent arguments which had come from Members of the Opposition, that nobody on the other side of the House had got up to show that they were wrong. The Solicitor-General had made a general statement which he thought had been proved to be incorrect by the speeches made on that side of the House. The First Lord of the Admiralty had said nothing; therefore it was to be presumed that he saw that the arguments which had been advanced were such as did not admit of reply. Therefore, with his great acuteness, he had said nothing, and was careful of his reputation; he had not committed himself to a reply which might be afterwards held to be inadequate to the occasion. There were several hon. Members present, the hon. Member for Denbighshire and the hon. Member for one of the divisions of Wales, and others, who were not only great authorities but extremely eloquent, and who could have been trusted, without the responsibility which attached to the Treasury Bench, to have risen and at any rate made some show of a defence against the reasons which had been put forward by his hon. friends around him. It appeared to him that there were two points which should be considered in connection with this clause.

The first was whether or not the time allowed was sufficient for the justices to do their work. That it was not sufficient was absolutely proved by the fact that the Solicitor-General had put down an Amendment to the clause, which provided that the time was to be extended, not by the Government, but by the Licensing Commission. But the Licensing Commissioners were not the people who ought to be entrusted with the power to extend the time. The original intention of the Government was that this scheme should be prepared by the licensing justices on 1st April, a very appropriate day as his hon. friend the mover of the Amendment had reminded them. If the Government had come to the conclusion that that was not the proper day, then they should themselves have extended the time by introducing an Amendment which would have provided a reasonable time in which the justices could prepare a scheme. There was nobody in that House or outside of it who really knew how long it would take to prepare a scheme, or what practical results it was to have, unless it was the Government. His hon. friend near him had, with his great prescience, so long ago as last March, asked how long it would take to prepare a scheme, or whether it would be possible for the justices to get the information to assist them in preparing a scheme. The Government said that it would require such an extreme length of time to get the information that they could not reply to the hon. Gentleman's question. But they would see that if they took from March to October they had seven months. Then if the Bill was passed by 1st January, he thought that was the estimate of the Solicitor-General, who added extreme sanguineness to his other great qualities—then taking from 1st January to 1st April, there remained—

*THE DEPUTY-CHAIRMAN said the hon. Baronet was discussing an Amendment which would come later. Of course the discussion could include the question of time, but they could not have two discussions, one now and another when the other Amendments were reached, and if they were to discuss the question of time now, it must be understood that there was not to be a second discussion.

SIR F. BANBURY said they were discussing under very disadvantageous circumstances, and it was quite probable that the other Amendments would never be reached, because they had only another hour and twenty minutes. Of course, he did not wish to carry the discussion further. [Cries of "Go on."] Very well, he would endeavour to show that the time allowed, from every point of view, was not sufficient. Let them consider what the licensing justices had to do. He understood that under this scheme there was no question of choosing houses or persons; it was merely the numbers which would be chosen. But he also understood that the number would have to be distributed over the different areas of the districts of the licensing justices. That was an extremely difficult task to perform, because they had not only to get the facts with regard to the areas, but they had to gather their information for the whole fourteen years. He understood that he was correct in saying that the facts would have to be ascertained with regard to the different areas and spread over the whole fourteen years. That being so, he thought that three months was not a sufficient time, and he also thought that any extension of time should be given by Parliament and not by the Licensing Commission. The justices were really being put as a sort of buffer between the Commissioners and the people. That was a very invidious position in which to place them. If there was to be any buffer it should be Parliament. He did not think it expedient from the point of view of the nation that the justices should be treated in this manner. The justices had very high functions entrusted to them; they had to exercise judicial authority in a proper manner, and though he did not for one moment believe that they would be actuated by a desire to seek for popularity, yet one did not want to put them into a disagreeable position. Therefore, under the circumstances, he hoped that his hon. friend's Amendment would be accepted. He felt that in all courtesy the arguments which had been advanced with great cogency by hon. Members on that side of the House ought at least to have had some reply, if not from Members of the Treasury Bench, at any rate from hon. Members who sat behind them, in order to enlighten the Committee on one of the most important clauses of the Bill.

MR. RICHARDSON (Nottingham, S.) said he had heard the whole of the speeches of hon. Members of the Opposition, and he must say, if he might do so without disrespect, that they appeared to him to be artificial and unreal, and not applied seriously to the Amendment before the House. Only two points, in his judgment, had been raised by Members of the Opposition. One was that it was a slight upon the justices to lay this duty upon them; and the second was that the justices were not the best instrument for carrying out the work. He had the honour to be one of a bench of magistrates, though he must say that he had not accepted the position for the sake of social distinction; but being a justice he could assure hon. Gentlemen opposite that no duty could be placed on his shoulders which he would carry out with greater pleasure than that of the enforcement of the provisions of this Bill, and especially this part of the measure which the Opposition wished to eliminate. He had noticed during the short time he had been on the bench that very many of the cases which came before them had their origin in these licensed houses; and he thought the justices would be better employed in doing away with some of those houses than in sentencing these unfortunate people to fourteen days imprisonment or inflicting upon them a fine of 15s. He thought the licensing justices were just the men to frame this scheme, because they knew the needs and requirements of their respective localities, and how the houses should be distributed. He hoped that the Government would stand by their proposal, and he opposed the Amendment.

VISCOUNT HELMSLEY (Yorkshire, N.R., Thirsk) said that the argument of the hon. Member who had just spoken pointed to something which was not in the Bill. The hon. Member argued that the justices were thoroughly well acquainted with the business they had to do, and, as a justice, he would like to have the whole discretion in dealing with licences. But in this case there was no discretion at all. Instead of having discretion in dealing with licences in a particular district the justices were bound by a hard and fast rule to make a certain statutory reduction within a given time. That was not a position in which magistrates ought to be placed.

THE DEPUTY-CHAIRMAN said that the Committee had already decided that the statutory reductions were to take place.

VISCOUNT HELMSLEY said he was merely endeavouring to answer the arguments of the hon. Member for Nottingham, and to show that the justices had no discretion in the matter of statutory reductions. He would like to say a word on the general question as to which no member of the Government had yet spoken. They had not heard why the Government had fixed upon this particular date for the reduction of the licences and what grounds they had for supposing that the magistrates had sufficient time to make a scheme for reduction. Another important point on which they ought to hear a good deal from the Government was, what was the general basis for a statutory reduction in proportion to population. [Cries of "Order."]

THE DEPUTY-CHAIRMAN said that the only question they were dealing with was that relating to the justices preparing schemes.

*MR. G. D. FABER said he could not help wondering why only three months were to be allowed to the licensing justices to perform this arduous business of preparing schemes. Clause 44 provided that the licensing justices should not during the year 1909 refuse the renewal or transfer of any old on-licence under circumstances involving the payment of compensation. That meant that the year 1909 was to be a period during which no licence would be touched, and that the Licensing Commission, whatever might happen in the case of the licensing justices, would require a whole year to make their arrangements, because the reduction period was not to begin until 1910. Why was it that the Commission had a whole year to consider this matter, and the licensing justices were only to be allowed three months? It was contrary to the promise which the Prime Minister had given in introducing the Bill that all the powers of the licensing justices were to be restored, to find that the licensing justices were to have nothing to do except to prepare a scheme. From his point of view it was derogatory to the dignity of the licensing justices that their powers should be whittled down to the preparation of a scheme which might be torn to tatters by the Commission. Having prepared a scheme, the justices were afterwards permitted to do no more than to act as common executioners by selecting the licences to be destroyed.

MR. JOHN RUTHERFORD (Lancashire, Darwen) thought that this clause was altogether objectionable. Every magistrates' clerk and chief constable throughout the country would object to the position in which it would place them; inasmuch as it would subject them to the approval of the town council and the magistrates, and also to the approval of the Commission in London. He supported the Amendment of his hon. friend.

TELLERS FOR THE NOES—Sir
 Edward Sassoon and Earl Winterton.

SIR S. EVANS moved to add the words after 1909, "Or such later day as may be allowed in any case by the Licensing Commission." He did not think that, in the ordinary course of things, the interval which would elapse between the passing of this measure and the operation of this clause was too short. It was not a general extension of time they desired, but if it was found in any particular locality on account of any difficulties of the work or for any special reason that the time was rather short they wanted the Licensing Commission to be able to do the best they could for the district generally, although they might not be able to present the scheme by the fixed date. It was merely to meet those exceptional cases that he had thought it necessary to put down this Amendment. There were about a thousand licensing districts, and, therefore, the work in the country would be distributed, but so far as the Commission was concerned, of course, they would have the supervision of the whole, and therefore it was quite necessary that they should have longer time than was permitted to the justices in the ordinary course to prepare schemes for their respective localities. It should be remembered that the scheme did not comprise the selection of the houses whose licences were to be extinguished.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 4, line 21, at the end, to insert the words 'or such later day as may be allowed in any case by the Licensing Commission.'"—
 (Sir Samuel Evans.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. F. E. SMITH moved to omit all the words of the Amendment after the word "as" in order to insert the words "they may think proper." The effect of that would be that the persons on whom the decision would rest as to whether there should be an extension or not would be the justices and not the Licensing Commission in London. He would ask the Committee to consider a little more carefully what the proposal of the Government meant. In this case they had local justices dealing with the needs of their own locality and the Government was imposing upon them the duty of preparing schemes. Supposing the justices found themselves unable in the proper time to prepare their scheme, they had to appeal to three gentlemen sitting in London who knew nothing of the locality in order to ask them as a matter of grace for a little delay. A more undemocratic proposal was never heard from any Government. He would like to remind the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the Solicitor-General, and the Home Secretary of a debate on the last Licensing Bill in 1904 in which most of them took part, and in which the then Leader of the Opposition, Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman, used the following words—

"We insist that there shall be no tampering with or modification of the discretion of the local magistrates. . . . We say that the discretion of the local magistrates ought not to be interfered with or modified, but it is to be abolished by this Bill. The local magistrate, the man on the spot, the man who knows all about it, who lives in the locality, is acquainted with its requirements, and is conversant with the feeling of the inhabitants; is to be practically set aside, except that he may, perhaps, send a written memorial to the superior court, and the estimable gentleman from another part of the world, who has no knowledge whatever of the circumstances, will be entrusted with this essential part of the magisterial control of the publican."

Those who applauded and cheered those sentences, when they were uttered, and supported the then Leader of the Opposition in the division lobby, came forward four years later with the proposal that the discretion of the licensing justices should be subordinated not to Quarter Sessions but to the decision of three gentlemen in London to be appointed by the Government, and who did not pretend to have the slightest acquaintance with the needs of the locality. If there was any sincerity in the case put forward by hon. Gentlemen opposite when in opposition that the discretion should be maintained, then there was no case in which it was more proper and essential to insist upon the maintenance of that discretion than in the case now under consideration. He begged to move.

Amendment proposed to the proposed Amendment—

"To leave out from the word 'as,' to the end, and to insert the words 'they may think proper.'"—(Mr. F. E. Smith.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the proposed Amendment."

MR. LANE-FOX (Yorkshire, W.R., Barkston Ash) said he supposed that on this Amendment it would be possible to raise the whole question of the existence and scope of the Commission.

*THE DEPUTY-CHAIRMAN: That would not be possible. It appears to me that the only question that is raised here is whether this matter is to be in the discretion of the Licensing Commission.

MR. LANE-FOX said he rather anticipated that that would be the ruling. It was just as well to know where they were. This Amendment dealt with the question of the subordination of the local justices to the Licensing Commission. It was not putting it too strongly to say that the justices were going to be asked to do the dirty work of the Commission in the preparation of the proposed schemes. It seemed to him that the justices might have been left to their own discretion in such a matter as the date for the completion of the schemes. The position of subordination the justices were in to the Licensing Commission was sufficiently degrading in many points to make a good many dislike the task put before them, and refuse to serve in that capacity. It was quite possible that the effect of the Bill as it stood might be that they would only get as justices those who were so determined on reform in this connection that the Bench would be composed entirely of ultra-teetotal people. He hoped the Government would give some further reason for the attitude they had adopted in refusing to give the justices this discretion.

SIR S. EVANS said it was in order that the Committee might come to a speedy decision on this matter that he rose to reply now. The point raised by the Amendment was whether the time should be extended. If they said in one part of the clause that the justices were to do this work by a certain date, and in another part at such another date, that would be contradictory. It was always interesting to listen to the hon. and learned Member for the Walton Division on democratic principles. He said that if the Government were to act on those principles in this matter, they would leave it to the discretion of the justices. Really that question did not arise on this Amendment. The quotation made from a speech of the late Prime Minister in 1904 was one which contained the expression of a view with which they all agreed and to which the Government had given the amplest effect in the Bill. The Government had said that the justices were the people to decide on the statutory reduction of licences. Of course, the Licensing Commission, or some other body, must be put over the licensing justices, because the latter would have no control over the fund, which was to be a general fund, and it was because it was a national fund for the whole of England and Wales that they must have some central body to deal with it. The Commission, however, were not put over them for the purpose of saying whether the licence of the "Black Bull" or the "Blue Boar" was to be taken away. The fullest discretion in that matter was given to the justices, and the Commission in London would have nothing to do with it. With regard to the benches being composed of ultra-tee-totallers, he knew what a teetotaller was, but not an ultra-teetotaller.

MR. LANE-FOX said the tendency of the condition imposed on the justices by this section would be to induce gentlemen who found the work burdensome to keep away.

SIR S. EVANS said he hoped the provisions of the Bill would not be such as to induce any of the present justices to withdraw from office, or to prevent anybody who desired to become a magistrate from still having that desire.

MR. YOUNGER, in supporting the Amendment, reminded the Solicitor-General of his own Amendments on the Paper, some of which tended to make this clause a little less stupid than it was at present. The alterations to be made in the clause by the Government wholly altered the situation and made the justices on the spot very much better judges of the time required to prepare the scheme than the Licensing Commission sitting in London who knew nothing whatever of the districts. Of course, it was convenient for the Government to evade all those points. They were extremely clever in doing so, but they were usually found out.

*MR. CLAVELL SALTER suggested to the mover of the Amendment that a certain amount of alteration in it was necessary. It would hardly do to enact that the justices should make their scheme before 1st April, or some future date. It was necessary to state some fixed date which they should have power to fix during the currency of a period. Provided that was done he could see nothing inconsistent or contradictory in the clause as it would then read. There was nothing novel in giving an authority power to extend the time in which it should perform some ministerial function. The practical question before the Committee was as to who was the best judge of the local circumstances of a particular scheme, and whether or not it was expedient that the time should be extended. The difficulties arising would be purely local and personal, as to which the Commission in London could, in the nature of the case, have no sort of knowledge, while the local justices must know fully all the circumstances of the case. It appeared to him that it would be more practical and desirable to allow the discretion as to the occasional extension of time to be exercised by those who had local knowledge.

*CAPTAIN FABER said the Solicitor-General had stated that the justices were to have the power to decide whether the licence of the "Black Bull" or the "Blue Boar" was to be extinguished. But it should be remembered that the Commissioners in London could act over the heads of the justices in regard to money, and the two houses might not be of the same value. If the justices were to recommend the Commissioners to do away with the "Black Bull," they might turn round and say they had not the £3000 necessary for compensation in that case, though the amount they had available would be sufficient to pay compensation in the case of the "Blue Boar." He hoped that the hon. and learned Gentleman would admit that there was some difficulty in the case.

Question put, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the proposed Amendment."

TELLERS FOR THE NOES—Mr.
F. E. Smith and Mr. Salter.

Question, "That those words be there inserted," put, and agreed to.

Amendments proposed—
"In page 4, line 26, after the word 'effect,' to insert the words 'as regards the number of licences.'"
"In page 4, line 27, after the word 'area,' to insert the words 'giving particulars of any modifications made in the strict application of the scale.'"—(Sir S. Evans.)

Amendments agreed to.
MR. JAMES HOPE moved an additional subsection (c) providing that the scheme should be published in every district, and a copy sent to each of the licensees and owners affected. He thought that the Amendment, which had originally been put down on the Paper by the hon. Member for Wandsworth, would commend itself to the Committee. He held that all the licensees and owners in a district which would be affected by the scheme ought to be informed of the nature of the scheme, so that they might have an opportunity of approaching the Commission and showing, if need be, that the licensing justices had neglected in any way to carry out the principles of the Schedule. It was a slight mitigation in the direction of an easier working, and as such he had no doubt the Government would accept it.

Amendment proposed—
"In page 4, line 31, at the end to insert the words '(c) be published in every district, and a copy sent to each of the licensees and owners affected."—(Mr. James Hope.)

SIR S. EVANS said the effect of the Amendment was that the scheme to be prepared by the justices and sent to the Committee was to be published in the district and copies sent to each of the licensees and owners affected. It meant that a copy was to be sent to everybody who held a licence or was interested in one. He thought the Amendment was probably put down by the hon. Baronet the Member for Wandsworth under a misapprehension. It was quite right that those who were interested in the licences to be taken away should be heard, but there was no reason that he could suggest to the Committee why the scheme, dealing not with individual cases of licences to be extinguished but with the reduction according to the Schedule of the Bill or the modification in the particular localities, should go to everybody who was interested in licences in the district. But after the scheme had been originally passed, then it was right that those with licences which it was proposed to extinguish should be heard. Under those circumstances he was afraid he could not accept the Amendment.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said they would never get to Clause 7 for the purposes of discussion, and therefore they would not settle finally the discussion which they had before dinner as to where they now stood. The Prime Minister, the Solicitor-General and the Front Bench opposite generally said they meant to have every kind of publicity and a fair trial or hearing for all the persons whose licences were threatened. Very well. Supposing a man's licence under the scheme was to be taken away, what was his defence? He could say: "I have a good business, and I do not think there is any reason why my licence should be taken away." But the justices would say: "Well, all you say is true, but we have to take away a certain number of licences. The other licensees are just as well behaved as you are, and every argument you can use is used by them, and the only argument before us is as to how many licences have to be taken away." That was the scheme. Why were the Government not, therefore, going to publish the scheme which would furnish the real substance of the argument that that licensee must deal with? All the licensee could say was: "You are obliged by law to deprive this district of, say, five licences, and you have chosen to include mine among the five. I only hear this for the first time to-day as you have not published the scheme. I have not had an opportunity of preparing an argument to show that if five licences are to be abolished mine should not be one of the five." Was not that a material point, and yet that was the scheme which the Government refused to publish. He was unable to understand, first, why there should be a scheme prepared by the magistrates, secondly, why that scheme should be accepted by the Licensing Commission, and, thirdly, why that scheme, being the only one at which an argument could occur before the magistrates when this hearing of which they were told so much took place, should be kept from the knowledge of those most nearly concerned.

SIR S. EVANS said he thought he made it plain that the scheme must follow the plan of the Bill—must have the population ratio of the Schedule. With that the individual licensee had nothing whatever to do, but when it came to the selection of the houses, and to the carrying out of the scheme which had been prepared, then the licensee would have notice and a good hearing.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR thought the licensee would not have a good hearing, but granting the thesis of the hon. and learned Gentleman, ought not the licensee to have the materials in respect to which that full hearing was to be held? What argument had the "Blue Bear," or whoever the particular victim was, to bring forward? It was not to be about his good behaviour, nor as to the needs of the district, because that was settled by the House of Commons in total ignorance of those needs. It could only be settled by a consideration of the number allowed in the district and by the proof which the owner of the "Blue Boar" could bring before the magistrates that if somebody was to be victimised he was not to be the man. But he must know exactly the number to be victimised; in other words, he must know the scheme. Surely the only argument he could bring forward was: "You tell me to-day that a certain number of licences have to be suppressed, and that you have chosen mine to be one of them. In my opinion if you have got to suppress these by law, the 'Red Lion' ought to be suppressed and not the 'Blue Boar.'" But the owner of the "Blue Boar" must know the general scheme before he used that argument. How could he make his defence unless he knew the scheme? The whole argument turned on the scheme. Therefore, let them publish the scheme and allow the man affected by it to know what it was and to frame the defence which would show that the "Red Lion" and not the "Blue Boar" was the licence that had to be sacrificed in order to meet the arbitrary and Procrustean method by which the learned Gentleman proposed to proceed. He could not tell why the Government resisted the Amendment. He thought the Government wanted the Bill to be not only unjust, but obviously and practically unjust. Even the smallest modification which they ventured to suggest, which did not touch or affect any vital principle of the measure, was unpityingly rejected. He could not understand why the Government in their own interests did not at all events attempt to soften the outlines of their picture, even though they refused to alter the main scheme. Let them make it as agreeable as they could for their unhappy victims. They were not content to do that. They were determined not merely to do that which was unjust, but to do it in a most unjust way. The very least they could do when they put these unhappy persons on their trial was to give them all the information possible in order to make their defence as complete as possible. That was a modest request, and it was absolutely refused, and the Solicitor-General had given no reason for refusing it. Indeed he said it might be granted if the magistrates liked. There was no disadvantage in granting it in the case of the magistrates or the Commission; then let them make obligatory what they admitted was not noxious, and they would at all events, have shown that this hearing should be made with all the circumstances, not merely before the magistrates, but in the possession of the man who was to be heard.

SIR HENRY KIMBER (Wandsworth) apologised for not being in his place in time to move the Amendment, and said it would be noticed that the provisions as to the preparation of the scheme described by Clauses 6 and 7 were all to be done in camera. No party interested was to be at liberty to appear. The justices and the Commission were to meet, he supposed, and it then became the duty of the justices to select the individual licences to be extinguished. Up to that point, and even after, the person affected was not to be heard at all. He was only to be heard if and when he applied for a renewal of the licence, which, unknown to him, perhaps, it had already been decided should be extinguished. Let them suppose he was to have a hearing on the question as to whether it was or was not to be extinguished on that occasion. Obviously the answer which the licensing justices—

And, it being half-past Ten of the Clock, the CHAIRMAN proceeded, pursuant to the Order of the House of the 17th July, to put forthwith the Question on the Amendment already proposed from the Chair.

Question put, "That those words be there inserted."

HOUSING OF THE WORKING CLASSES (IRELAND) BILL.

Order of the day for the House to be put into Committee, read.

VOL. CXCIV. [FOURTH SERIES.]

Moved, "That the House do now resolve itself into Committee."—(Lord Denman.)

On Question, Motion agreed to.

House in Committee accordingly.

[The Earl of ONSLOW in the Chair.]

Clauses 1 and 2 agreed to

Clause 3:

LORD DENMAN explained that the clause as it stood enabled local authorities to re-borrow for the purpose of paying off loans raised under the Housing of the Working Classes Act. The object of the Amendment standing in his name was to provide that where money was so borrowed under the clause it must be repaid within the period fixed for the discharge of the original loan.

Amendment moved—

"In page 2, line 19, after the word 'section,' to insert the words, '(2) All money re-borrowed under this section shall be repaid within the period fixed for the discharge of the original loan, and every loan for re-borrowing shall, for the purpose of the ultimate discharge, be deemed to form part of the same loan as the original loan, and the obligations of the local authority with respect to the discharge of the original loan shall not be in any way effected by means of the re-borrowing.'"—(Lord Denman.)

LORD ASHBOURNE thought it would have been a blot on the Bill if this Amendment had not been introduced, as local authorities would have been enabled to re-borrow ad infinitum without paying off their debts. The Amendment would ensure that whenever there was re-borrowing the new loan would be repaid within the time of the original loan. That was an important matter, and the Amendment had his support.

THE EARL OF MAYO said the Return which the Irish Office had just prepared at his instigation showed that some towns in Ireland had borrowed enormous sums, and had paid very little of it off. He thought it was important that the Government should consider the indebtedness of these towns before extending further borrowing powers to them.

LORD DENMAN replied that the Committee were at the moment on a different point altogether. The object of the present Amendment was to provide that where money was re-borrowed it must be repaid within the same time as that fixed for the original loan.

On Question, Amendment agreed to.

Clause 3, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 4 agreed to.

Clause 5 :

LORD DENMAN explained that the object of his first Amendment in this clause was to insert a reference to the provisions of Section 238 of the public Health Act, which regulated the method in which local authorities were to provide annually for the repayment of loans.

Amendment moved—

“In page 3, line 20, after the word ‘is’ to insert the words ‘in accordance with the provisions of subsection 4 of Section 238 of the Public Health (Ireland) Act, 1878, as amended by this Act,’”—(Lord Denman.)

On Question, Amendment agreed to.

Amendment moved—

“In page 3, line 20, after the word ‘pay’ to insert the words ‘or to set apart.’”—(Lord Denman.)

THE LORD CHAIRMAN: Is this a consequential Amendment?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE DUCHY (LORD FITZMAURICE) explained that the words “or to set apart” were technical words used to describe a particular form of repayment.

On Question, Amendment agreed to.

Drafting Amendment agreed to.

LORD DENMAN said the object of his next Amendment was to provide that local authorities were to obtain the benefit of the Irish Housing Fund in the case only of loans raised after the passing of this Bill.

Amendment moved—

“In page 3, line 34, after the word ‘authority’ to insert the words ‘(3) In ascertaining the amount of the annual housing charge of any local authority, no account shall be taken of any sums payable or liable to be set apart by the authority in respect of moneys re-borrowed for the discharge of loans raised before the passing of this Act.”—(Lord Denman.)

LORD ASHBOURNE invited the noble Lord in charge of the Bill to state to the Committee the scheme of Amendment. It would be convenient, for instance, if the Committee could be informed what limitation it was intended should be put on towns that were to be entitled to the benefit of the Bill. He imagined that it was not intended that every town under town commissioners, no matter how small its population or size, should be given the great powers contained in this Bill. He knew of one town under commissioners which contained a population of only 1,100 or 1,200. He believed there was a subsequent Amendment dealing with that point. Perhaps the noble Lord would explain.

LORD DENMAN suggested that the noble and learned Lord should raise the point when they came to the Amendment in question.

LORD ASHBOURNE said it would be a great convenience in the discussion of the Bill to have an answer to that important and plain question which he had asked. The point must have been considered by the Government. Was it intended that all towns under town commissioners, without any limitation, were to be given these large discretionary powers? If the noble Lord was not prepared now to reply, he would not press for an immediate answer.

On Question, Amendment agreed to.

Drafting Amendment agreed to.

Clause 5, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 6 :

Drafting Amendments agreed to.

VISCOUNT MIDLETON moved to omit the words “and authorising the compulsory purchase of land for the purpose.” The tendency of a great deal of legislation, both in respect to this country and to Ireland, in the course of the last few years had been towards taking power out of the hands of Parliament and concentrating it in the Local Government Board. He was not at all certain that those who had had most to do with municipal work did not feel that that tendency had been too pronounced, and that powers had been placed in the hands of the Local Government Board which might with better results have been left in the hands of Parliament. But quite certain it was that this clause went far beyond anything which had been hitherto sanctioned by Parliament with regard to Great Britain in placing it in the power of the Local Government Board to take land, and to authorise the taking of land, against the wish of the landowners, for the housing of the working classes. The English Act of 1890 required the confirmation by Parliament of any Provisional Order made under the Act, and frivolous opposition was prevented by a special subsection. In 1903 the British Act went further. It gave to the Local Government Board additional powers, but it specially reserved and limited those powers to cases where land was not to be compulsorily acquired. If compulsory acquisition were involved due notice of the draft order had to be issued, and the draft order only took effect if no opposition were offered against it. The Amendment he proposed would bring the wording of this Bill into accord with that of the Act of 1903 for England. He knew no valid reason for a distinction between Great Britain and Ireland in this matter. This work could not be so imperative that it was impossible to come to Parliament for the confirmation of a Provisional Order. If it were a question of a scheme for national defence one could imagine that expedition would be of the first order.

Amendment moved—

"In page 4, lines 8 and 9, to leave out the words 'and authorising the compulsory purchase of land for the purpose.'"—(Viscount Middleton.)

LORD DENMAN said he knew of several precedents for the Local Government Board having the power asked for without coming to Parliament. Under Section 39 of the Act of 1890 and under the Irish Labourers Act of 1906 the Local Government Board were empowered to confirm an Order made by their Inspector after full inquiry, without going to Parliament. He could further state that since the passing of the Act of 1890 there had never been any opposition to an Order made by the Local Government Board of Ireland for purposes such as these. Surely if for seventeen years the Local Government Board had exercised their powers so efficiently it was right to infer that they would do as equally well in the future. The objection to having to come to Parliament was not only one of expense; there was also the question of delay. In order to get a Provisional Order Bill through Parliament it had to be presented at a particular period of the year—namely, in the autumn. If the Amendment of the noble Viscount were introduced a local authority, which perhaps might require compulsory powers immediately, would not be able to put their Provisional Order before Parliament until next autumn, and it would not pass into law until, he supposed, the following May or June; that was to say, they would have to wait for a year and a half at least for a thing which ought, if it were a good thing, to be done in a very few months. Moreover, there would always be a possibility of a petition against the Order, which would necessitate further delay. Therefore, the Amendment, if carried, would practically neutralise the benefit of the clause and render it almost worthless. If the noble Viscount pressed the Amendment he would have to divide the Committee upon it.

LORD ASHBOURNE was not sure that the noble Lord was quite correct in saying there was an exact parallel in existing legislation. He did not think there was. An Order of the Local Government Board was, he knew, given great power under former Acts, but the Order was one which had been reviewed and confirmed by the Local Government Board itself. That was here expressly excluded by the wording of the clause. The words were that the Order should take effect—

"Without confirmation by Parliament or by the Local Government Board."

The confirmation might be a mere technical form of approval by the Local Government Board, but this check should not be omitted.

*THE LORD PRIVY SEAL AND SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (The Earl of CREWE): This is a question on which I quite admit some doubt is legitimate. It is, no doubt, as a general rule, the custom, and the approved custom, that where land is taken compulsorily, power for doing so should only be given by Parliament; but my noble friend behind me pointed out, I think with considerable force, that in cases of this kind, there is a very real inconvenience in the delay which may ensue. It is not only that delay ensues in cases where a petition is presented, but the possibility that a petition may be presented causes a similar delay to take place in every case. It is only during the short period in which petitions of this kind may be lodged before Parliament that any operations under the Act can take place. The noble and learned Lord has made a somewhat alternative suggestion. I gather from what he said that he would not be entirely discontented if the review of the Local Government Board were substituted for consideration by Parliament. I think that is a point well worthy of consideration, and if the noble and learned Lord will allow the matter to stand over until the Report stage we might see whether an arrangement can be arrived at on that head.

THE EARL OF MAYO failed to see the need of such great hurry in the matter, and why the control of Parliament should be removed. This was not a Government Bill; it had been introduced by Mr. Clancy, a Nationalist M.P., and they looked upon it with some doubt on that account. In the circumstances he could not undertake the argument as to the need for such great expedition.

LORD FITZMAURICE said that, as he remembered rightly, there was some special machinery in the Small Holdings Act of last year altering the usual procedure in regard to the compulsory taking or hiring of land. He did not say that it was altogether in pari materia, but he mentioned it as showing that the question was a complicated one, and had to be examined according to the circumstances of each country, and according to the subject-matter with which the Act dealt. He urged that as a reason for what his noble friend the Leader of the House had suggested, that the Government should be allowed to make some further examination of the question, and see whether an arrangement could not be arrived at.

VISCOUNT MIDLETON declared his intention of pressing the Amendment. The point was an important one, as a series of precedents were being built up for withdrawing from Parliament control in the matter of the compulsory acquisition of land. If the question was one of expedition he could cite several instances in London where large sums were spent on working-class houses which were now found to be unlettable.

On Question, that the words "and authorising the compulsory purchase of land for the purpose" stand part of the clause.

Their Lordships divided:—Contents, 28; Not-contents, 61.

Consequential Amendments agreed to.

VISCOUNT MIDLETON moved the insertion of two paragraphs which he explained were consequential upon the Amendment to which the Committee had just agreed.

Amendment moved—

“In page 4, line 14, after the word ‘Board’ to insert the words ‘(a) if land is not proposed to be taken compulsorily; or (b) if, although land is proposed to be taken compulsorily, the Local Government Board, before making an absolute order, are satisfied that notice of the draft or provisional order, as the case may be, has been served as required as respects a provisional order by subsection (5) of section (8) of the Act of 1890, and also that the draft or provisional order, as the case may be, has been published in the Dublin Gazette, and that a petition against it has not been presented to the Local Government Board by any owner of land proposed to be taken compulsorily within two months after the date of the publication and the service of notice, or, having been so presented, has been withdrawn.’”—
 (Viscount Middleton.)

On Question, Amendment agreed to.

Consequential Amendment agreed to.

VISCOUNT MIDLETON said the object of the two new subsections which he now moved was to carry out the purport of the English Act, to which the clause was now assimilated.

Amendment moved—

“In page 4, line 24, after subsection (3) to insert the words ‘(4) If an order under subsection (4) of Section 8, or under Section 39 of the Act of 1890, which, if no petition were presented, would take effect without confirmation, is petitioned against, the Local Government Board may, if it thinks fit, on the application of the local authority, make any modifications in the scheme to which the order relates for the purpose of meeting the objections of the petitioner, and withdraw the order sanctioning the original scheme, substituting for it an order sanctioning the modified scheme. (5) The same procedure shall be followed as to the publication and giving notices, and the same provisions shall apply as to the presentation of petitions and the effect of the order, in the case of the order sanctioning the modified scheme, as in the case of the order sanctioning the original scheme, but no petition shall be received or have any effect except one which was presented against the original order, or one which is concerned solely with the modifications made in the scheme as sanctioned by the new order.’”—

 (Viscount Middleton.)

On Question, Amendment agreed to.

Clause 6, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 7:—

*THE EARL OF PEMBROKE AND MONTGOMERY moved the omission of the clause. The clause, he said, enabled local authorities to go beyond their own district in order to acquire land, and to build upon that land dwellings for the working classes. The Bill also proposed to follow the lines of the English Act of 1903, and allow municipal bodies to exceed their borrowing power limits and spend the rate-payers' money in erecting these dwellings. He thought it was enough to allow local authorities to exercise the large powers which the Bill gave them within their own districts. Surely it would not be fair to permit the Corporation of Dublin to acquire land and build houses in Rathmines or Pembroke against the wishes of the local authorities of these and they desired the Local Government Board in Ireland to be, as in England, the supreme authority.

Amendment moved—

“ In page 5, line 23, after the word ‘ may ’ to insert the words ‘ with the consent of the Local Government Board. ’ ”—(The Earl of Mayo.)

LORD DENMAN said the Amendment was an improvement of the Bill, and he was glad to accept it.

On Question, Amendment agreed to.

Consequential Amendment agreed to.

Clause 8, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 9 :

LORD ASHBOURNE moved to omit Clause 9 (Remission and abatement of rates in certain cases). He said this unprecedented proposal was that a local authority which desired to apply this Bill might remit for ten years the rates payable in respect of these working-class dwellings to be erected in the future. He ventured to say that the oldest and most experienced member of their Lordships' House could not recall any precedent for such a clause. It was novel and startling. The clause also provided that—

“ if at any time any such premises are let to or occupied by other persons than such as aforesaid [persons of the working classes], or at rents not sanctioned as aforesaid, then in every such case any rates so remitted or, as the case may be, the balance of any rates so abated as aforesaid, shall be and become a charge upon the owner's interest in such premises.”

Yet the owner might have had no voice as to the persons who should occupy the premises. He mentioned this in order to call attention to the utterly indefensible way in which the clause was drawn. There was no application to an independent tribunal ; the decision as to whether the buildings had been occupied by people who did not come within the definition of working classes would rest with the local authority. He put his opposition to the clause on the broad ground that it would be unwise and unjust in the last degree to give the local authority the power to remit rates in advance on certain property regardless of the rights of other ratepayers.

Amendment moved—

“ To leave out Clause 9. ”—(Lord Ashbourne.)

LORD DENMAN thought that a good many provisions that had found a place in Irish Acts of Parliament might have been described as novel and startling. The object of the clause was to offer an inducement to private owners to undertake the erection of what might be unremunerative dwellings. He submitted that ample safeguards against the abuse of the powers conferred by the clause were provided. It applied only to dwellings erected after the passing of the Act. The rent of the dwellings must be sanctioned by the local authority, who in their turn were required to get the consent of the Local Government Board. In the Second Reading debate, Lord Mayo stated that the Local Government Board was one of the best administered departments in Ireland. Surely they could be trusted to see that the provisions of this clause were not abused or taken undue advantage of. However, if the noble and learned Lord persisted in his objection to the clause, the Government did not propose to put the House to the trouble of a division, although they could not assent to the Amendment.

LORD ATKINSON said the effect of the clause was this, that the local authority was to raise money from other portions of the community in order to give a grant in aid of the rents of the working classes. That was a most extraordinary and far-reaching principle. The consent of the Local Government Board had to be obtained to the remission of rates, but the local authority could, at any time it pleased, after the remission had gone on for a certain period, come to the conclusion that the houses had been let to persons other than members of the working class, of which class there was no definition, and, thereupon, all the rates purported to be remitted could be recovered from the owner of the property, and the local authority itself was to decide whether or not the houses had been occupied by persons not belonging to the working-classes. He would like to know whether any precedent for that could be found, not only in Irish legislation, but in the legislation of any other civilised country. The owner might have had no power to regulate or determine who were to occupy the houses, which might be in the tenancy of some lessee. He contended that the clause was unjust in every line.

*THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNÉ: I gathered from the noble Lord who has charge of the Bill that His Majesty's Government will not press this clause if we insist upon its omission. I am bound to say, after listening to the discussion which has taken place, that I hope my noble and learned friend will press his Amendment. The clause seems to me to be a most dangerous one. It comes to this, that immunity from rates is to be given to certain premises which are to be provided for the housing of the working classes. Of course, it follows that the rates which are not paid upon those premises will have to be paid by the other ratepayers. That is an initial injustice. Look how the whole of this arrangement lends itself to jobbery—and we all know—let us be frank about it—that in these Irish municipalities there is a great deal of jobbery. This proposal facilitates jobbery of a most dangerous kind. We are told: "Oh there is a safeguard. The support of the Local Government Board is indispensable before this immunity from rates can be afforded." I venture to doubt whether this is any safeguard at all. The Local Government Board will have to administer the clause as they find it. The clause itself is radically unsound, and whether the Local Government Board allow it to be applied in all cases or only in a few, I submit that its application is essentially unjust. There is one effect which the introduction of this proposed system cannot fail to have. It must act as a great discouragement to private enterprise in the provision of better accommodation for the working classes. How can you expect anyone to put up on an economic basis improved cottages for housing the working classes if he is liable to find other houses erected by the local authority side by side with his, and let at rents artificially reduced under this clause? I have not lately had an opportunity of referring to the document, but some of your Lordships may carry in your minds the famous Report of the Royal Commission on the Poor Law in 1832. I believe I am right in saying that in that Report the strongest possible condemnation is to be found of all proposals to give immunity from rates to certain premises merely because they were intended for the accommodation of the working classes. All sound economic authorities have set their face against proposals of this kind. Therefore, if my noble and learned friend presses for the deletion of this clause I shall support him.

On Question, Amendment agreed to.

Clause 10:

*LORD CLONBROCK moved to omit the clause with a view to substituting other words which would assimilate the law to that in England. In England, after a closing order has been obtained, there must be continued default, a further summons by the local authority, and adjudication thereon by the justices, before a demolition order can be made. He failed to see any reason why local authorities in Ireland should be given more drastic powers in regard to closing and demolition orders than were given to local authorities in England.

Amendment moved—

"To leave out Clause 10 and to insert as a new clause, '10. (1) If, in the opinion of the local authority, any dwelling house is not reasonably capable of being made fit for human habitation, or is in such a state that the occupation thereof should be immediately discontinued it shall not be necessary for them, before obtaining a closing order, to serve a notice on the owner or occupier of the premises to abate the nuisance, and a justice may issue a summons for a closing order, and a closing order may be granted, although such a notice has not been served. (2) The Local Government Board may by order prescribe forms in substitution for those in the Fourth Schedule to the Act of 1890, and Section 32 of that Act shall have effect as if the forms so prescribed were referred to therein in lieu of the forms in that Schedule.' "

—(Lord Clonbrock.)

LORD FITZMAURICE explained that the object was to get rid of delay that and they desired the Local Government Board in Ireland to be, as in England, the supreme authority.

Amendment moved—

“In page 5, line 23, after the word ‘may’ to insert the words ‘with the consent of the Local Government Board.’”—(The Earl of Mayo.) to remit rates in advance on certain property regardless of the rights of other ratepayers.

LORD DENMAN said the Amendment was an improvement of the Bill, and he was glad to accept it.

Amendment moved—

“To leave out Clause 9.”—(Lord Ashbourne.)

LORD DENMAN thought that a good many provisions that had found a place in Irish Acts of Parliament might have been described as novel and startling. The object of the clause was to offer an inducement to private owners to undertake the erection of what might be unremunerative dwellings. He submitted that ample safeguards against the abuse of the powers conferred by the clause were provided. It applied only to dwellings erected after the passing of the Act. The rent of the dwellings must be sanctioned by the local authority, who in their turn were required to get the consent of the Local Government Board. In the Second Reading debate, Lord Mayo stated that the Local Government Board was one of the best administered departments in Ireland. Surely they could be trusted to see that the provisions of this clause were not abused or taken undue advantage of. However, if the noble and learned Lord persisted in his objection to the clause, the Government did not propose to put the House to the trouble of a division, although they could not assent to the Amendment.

LORD ATKINSON said the effect of the clause was this, that the local authority was to raise money from other portions of the community in order to give a grant in aid of the rents of the working classes. That was a most extraordinary and far-reaching principle. The consent of the Local Government Board had to be obtained to the remission of rates, but the local authority could, at any time it pleased, after the remission had gone on for a certain period, come to the conclusion that the houses had been let to persons other than members of the working class, of which class there was no definition, and, thereupon, all the rates purported to be remitted could be recovered from the owner of the property, and the local authority itself was to decide whether or not the houses had been occupied by persons not belonging be contended that the provision of workmen's dwellings in urban districts was not even more necessary than in rural areas. He therefore hoped their Lordships would consent to the larger sum of £100 remaining in the Bill.

LORD ATKINSON said it was quite right that where only a small plot of ground was sold and the purchase money was a small sum, the expense of having to pay it into Court should not be incurred. But the danger that Lord Mayo wished to guard against was that a limited owner, by selling a number of plots one after another, might succeed in receiving a very considerable sum in the aggregate, thus procuring for his own purposes what really represented a portion of the inheritance of which he was only the life owner. He thought the mischief could be guarded against by introducing the words "not to exceed in the aggregate a sum of £500," or some words to that effect.

*THE EARL OF CREWE: I am impressed by the force of what has fallen from the noble and learned Lord, and it seems to me there may be need for inserting some safeguard of the kind he desires. It would certainly not be reasonable that a limited owner who had an estate of building land should be able to sell piecemeal and obtain the whole value for himself. At the same time, limiting the amount of each particular sale, as the noble Earl proposes, would not remove the difficulty, as the same process might be carried on on a more limited scale. If the noble Lord will leave the matter over till the Report stage we will consider the point in the meantime.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 12 agreed to.

Clause 13:

*THE EARL OF PEMBROKE AND MONTGOMERY said this clause was entirely without precedent. The first subsection provided that—

"Any body corporate may, notwithstanding any restriction arising by statute or otherwise, if they think fit, appropriate any land held by them for any purpose for the provision by them of dwellings available for the working-classes, or transfer any land so held by them to any other person for the purpose of that provision, either by way of free grant or for such consideration and on such terms as they in their discretion think fit."

He proposed to strike out the word "notwithstanding," and to insert "subject to." Under the clause as it stood it would be very easy for a body of crank philanthropists, with the assistance of representatives of the working classes on the council, to make free gifts of property held on charitable and other trusts to form free sites for artisans' dwellings. This was an absolutely new proposal in legislation, and he proposed that these enormous powers should not be granted without a certain amount of restriction.

Amendment moved—

"In page 6, line 35, to leave out the word 'notwithstanding' and to insert the words 'subject to.'"—(The Earl of Pembroke and Montgomery.)

LORD DENMAN regretted that in this particular instance he was unable to quote any precedent for the clause as it stood; but, at the same time, he thought it was an important and necessary clause and one which should remain in the Bill. It was, as drawn, a wide clause: but Amendments stood on the Paper in his own name and that of Lord Meath, which the Government would accept, which would considerably restrict its operation. He was informed that the effect of the Amendment would inevitably be that the whole clause would be useless, and the noble Earl might just as well move its omission. The object of the clause—a perfectly reasonable one—was to remove restrictions and enable bodies corporate to divert land held by them from some particular purpose to that of the erection of dwellings available for the working classes. There would be considerable safeguards and restrictions.

*THE EARL OF PEMBROKE AND MONTGOMERY asked what the safeguards were.

LORD DENMAN referred the noble Earl to the Amendments standing in his (Lord Denman's) name on the Paper. In this case, again, the local authority would be subject to the control of the Local Government Board.

LORD ASHBOURNE could not see that the acceptance of the Amendment would necessarily kill the clause.

*THE EARL OF CREWE: Will the noble and learned Lord explain what is to prevent a corporation or any other body taking land which is subject to no restrictions either by statute or otherwise?

LORD ASHBOURNE: I do not know.

*THE EARL OF CREWE: In that case what would be the use of the clause?

*THE EARL OF PEMBROKE AND MONTGOMERY intimated his willingness to agree to the deletion of the words "or otherwise."

LORD ATKINSON said it would be intolerable that local authorities should take property held on trust created by statute or deed for one purpose and devote it to an entirely different purpose.

*THE LORD CHAIRMAN explained what he thought was the real object of the clause. When a local authority applied to Parliament to be enabled to acquire land for a particular purpose, and subsequently found that they did not require it for that purpose, they could not, without further powers, utilise it in any other way. He gathered that the real intention of the clause was that where an authority had acquired land for one purpose by statute they should have power to use it, if they desired to do so, for the erection of workmen's dwellings. He agreed that there should be a provision that local authorities should not take property held on trust.

*THE EARL OF CREWE: I think we are all anxious that a clause of this kind should be arrived at by general agreement, because it clearly is important that we should safeguard land which ought not to be used for this purpose. What I should like to put to noble Lords opposite is this. Reading in the Amendment of the noble Earl on the cross benches,

Lord Denman.

Lord Meath, which we have announced our intention to accept, namely—

"Provided that nothing in this Act shall authorise the appropriation or utilisation for the purposes of the Act of any common or commonable land, or any recreation ground, village green, or other open space dedicated to the use of the public, or any disused burial ground, or any land held on trusts which prohibit building thereon—"

are there any other cases in which harm could be done to the public interests by the utilisation for working class dwellings of land in the possession of a municipality? Are there any lands held in trust by municipalities, other than those covered by Lord Meath's Amendment, which it would be contrary to the public interest to use for workmen's dwellings?

LORD ATKINSON said there were in Ireland instances of ground held for the purpose of hospitals; this would be alienable.

LORD FITZMAURICE suggested that a sufficient safeguard was offered by the second subsection, providing that the consent of the Local Government Board should be necessary. Could it possibly be imagined that the Local Government Board of Ireland would rashly give its consent to the improper alienation of land such as had been referred to? The clause was primarily intended to deal with such cases as had been described by the Lord Chairman. The Local Government Board could be relied upon to act in the protection of the public, and with the addition of the Amendment which Lord Meath would subsequently move there could be no serious risk of harm being done.

THE EARL OF MEATH thought the Local Government Board would often be placed in an awkward position in this matter. Very rightly the Local Government Board had been continually urging municipal authorities to expend money in housing working classes who were now improperly housed, and if a municipal authority had a site in their possession upon which they might build workmen's houses without much expense the Local Government Board would be placed in a very awkward position if they refused their consent. He would illustrate what he meant by an example. He owned property in the city of Dublin which was almost entirely covered by working-class dwellings many of them erected in recent years. He had purposely reserved, at pecuniary loss to himself, some small open spaces adjoining for the purpose of playgrounds, and he had often been asked why he did not hand them over to the corporation of Dublin. He was thankful now that he had not done so, because with such a clause as this the result would be that his heirs would lose all the benefit from building upon that land and the people would lose the open space.

*THE EARL OF PEMBROKE AND MONTGOMERY did not like parting with his Amendment, but would do so subject to words covering his point being added to Lord Meath's new subsection. He suggested that the words "which prohibit building thereon" should be deleted, and the words "for public or charitable purposes" substituted. That would meet a great deal of his objection to the clause as it stood.

*THE EARL OF CREWE: It is rather difficult off-hand to give a decided and definite answer, but we would certainly agree to the insertion of those words now, subject to the matter being considered before the next stage.

*THE EARL OF PEMBROKE AND MONTGOMERY: I understand the Government will accept Lord Meath's Amendment altered as I have suggested?

*THE EARL OF CREWE: Yes, provisionally.

THE EARL OF PEMBROKE AND MONTGOMERY thereupon withdrew his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

LORD DENMAN explained that the object of his next Amendment, which came before Lord Meath's, was to restrict the operation of the clause. He did not suppose, therefore, that it would be objected to.

Amendment moved—

"In page 6, line 39, to leave out the word 'or' and to insert the words 'and where the body corporate is a local authority may let out any such land on lease as if the land had been acquired under and for the purposes of Part III. of the Act of 1890, and where the body corporate is not a local authority may."—(Lord Denman.)

On Question, Amendment agreed to.

THE EARL OF MEATH then moved to insert in the clause his proposed new subsection. He was very pleased to know that His Majesty's Government intended to accept it, and therefore it would be unnecessary to detain the Committee by proving its necessity. He might say, however, that he was very much astonished that the Bill should be permitted to have gone so far without notice having been taken of this omission. He could only think that it must have been hurried through the other House, because for the past twenty-seven years at least the whole purport of our legislation with regard to open spaces had been to protect them. From the year 1881, when the Metropolitan Open Spaces Act passed for London, they went on to the year 1884 when disused burial grounds were protected, to 1887 when Ireland was included, and to 1890 when trustees were distinctly given power to perpetuate the use of open spaces. Then in 1899, when the Government of London was reconstituted, special care was taken in that statute to prevent the alienation of open spaces, and in 1906 the local authorities were especially told that they must look upon the open spaces as being held by them in trust—

"with a view to the enjoyment thereof by the public as open spaces and for no other purpose."

In the present Bill as it stood it was proposed to reverse all this legislation, but he was glad to know that His Majesty's Government were prepared to accept his Amendment. He could not help thinking, however, that the words which Lord Pembroke proposed to insert would rather weaken the subsection.

Amendment moved—

"In page 7, line 11, after subsection (3) to insert the following new subsection:—'(4) Provided that nothing in this Act shall authorise the appropriation or utilisation for the purposes of the Act of any common or commonable land, or any recreation ground, village green, or other open space dedicated to the use of the public, or any disused burial ground or any land held on trusts which prohibit building thereon.'"—(The Earl of Meath.)

this case, again, the local authority would be subject to the control of the Local Government Board.

LORD ASHBOURNE could not see that the acceptance of the Amendment would necessarily kill the clause.

*THE EARL OF CREWE: Will the noble and learned Lord explain what is to prevent a corporation or any other body taking land which is subject to no restrictions either by statute or otherwise?

LORD ASHBOURNE: I do not know.

*THE EARL OF CREWE: In that case what would be the use of the clause?

*THE EARL OF PEMBROKE AND MONTGOMERY intimated his willingness to agree to the deletion of the words "or otherwise."

LORD ATKINSON said it would be intolerable that local authorities should take property held on trust created by statute or deed for one purpose and devote it to an entirely different purpose.

are there any other cases in which harm could be done to the public interests by the utilisation for working class dwellings of land in the possession of a municipality? Are there any lands held in trust by municipalities, other than those covered by Lord Meath's Amendment, which it would be contrary to the public interest to use for workmen's dwellings?

PRIVATE BILL BUSINESS.

EDUCATION BOARD PROVISIONAL ORDERS CONFIRMATION (CORNWALL, ETC.) BILL [LORDS] (By ORDER).

[THIRD READING.]

Order for Third Reading read.

*MR. CLOUGH (Yorkshire, W.R., Skipton) said he did not desire to detain the House at any length, and he would, therefore, compress his complaint against the Bill into a few words. The key of the puzzle was to be found in two words in the first line of the schedule, viz., East Hardwick. Now East Hardwick was a school within the jurisdiction of the West Riding. The existing school was condemned by the Board of Education inspectors as far back as 1901. It was taken over by the local education authority on the appointed day, 1st April, 1904. In 1905 the local education committee formulated its requirements with regard to the school building, and after many negotiations the managers replied in November, 1906, that they had no funds out of which the school could be repaired. Thereupon the local education authority decided to provide a school themselves. That was in December, 1906. The Board of Education sent down their decision that a new school should be provided by the local education authority in May, 1907, and that decision had not yet been rescinded. He (Mr. Clough) asked a Question of the President of the Board of Education in July this year, and he said it had not been rescinded up to the 14th of that month. The Board urged the local authority to provide the school with all despatch. The local authority endeavoured to secure a site, but all the local owners of suitable and eligible sites refused to sell to the local education authority, who appealed for compulsory powers. The Board made a provisional order, which was incorporated in the Bill now down for Third Reading. It was introduced in the House of Lords on 5th May. The Second Reading came on on 1st June in the House of Lords, when Viscount Halifax moved that it be an Instruction to the Committee to omit this particular order and schedule with regard to the West Riding. The debate was adjourned till 24th June, when Lord Crewe, on behalf of the Government, undertook to withdraw the order on the Committee stage. On that understanding the Bill was read a second time. It passed through Committee, was reported, read a third time, and sent to the Commons on 21st July, minus the order regarding the West Riding. He (Mr. Clough) submitted that the Board of Education and the House of Commons ought not to take this Instruction from the House of Lords. He submitted that the order was purely an administrative measure, but the so-called constitutional party appeared to have strained the constitution of another place, perhaps out of fellow feeling to a brother landowner, or it might be to flout the West Riding County Council, the most progressive local education authority throughout England and Wales. [OPPOSITION cries of "Oh."] He had two appeals to make. One to the House of Commons that it would assert its supremacy over administration as well as over finance, and he appealed to the President of the Board of Education, seeing that East Hardwick was a single school area, and there was no choice of schools for the parents to send their children to, to see that there should not be a new denominational school, privately controlled, in which the teachers should have to submit to sectarian tests, but that it should be a public elementary school provided by the local education authority. He begged to move.

*MR. SPEAKER: Move what?

*MR. CLOUGH: That the Bill be re-committed.

*MR. SPEAKER: If the hon. Member had told me at the commencement that he was going to move the recommitment I should have told him that he was not entitled to do so now. I only permitted him to speak because I understood after a protest from him the Bill would go through unopposed. The time to take opposed Private Bills is 8.15 p.m., and not three o'clock in the afternoon.

*MR. CLOUGH: If you understood that, Sir, I shall not move.

Bill read the third time and passed, without Amendment.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS CIRCULATED WITH THE VOTES

Conveyance of American Mails.

MR. HENNIKER HEATON (Canterbury): To ask the Postmaster-General whether the letters from Great Britain and Ireland to the United States and Canada are carried in the fast and powerful American and German steamships at the rate of 1s. 8d. per lb., while the British Government pays 3s. per lb. or a sum equalling 3s. per lb. for the conveyance of letters on British ships, whether the whole cost of conveying the mails for the United States of America and Canada, sent via New York at the higher rate, is charged to the British Post Office; and whether he has made any protest to the Chancellor of the Exchequer with a view to having the accounts in this respect adjusted, seeing that the higher rates are properly given to British shipowners for other than postal purposes; and what would be the saving to the British Post Office if the whole of the letters and newspapers transmitted last year to New York were paid for at the rate given to German and American vessels.

(Answered by Mr. Sydney Burton.) The facts are not as the hon. Member supposes. The payment to the American and German companies is made at the Postal Union rate, equivalent up to 31st December last to 1s. 9½d. a pound, and since that date to 1s. 5d. a pound.

The payment to the British contract vessels for the last contract year, expiring on 31st July last, for the conveyance of letters to the United States and Canada via New York, amounted (so far as can be estimated) to a sum slightly in excess of 1s. 10d. per pound. This sum decreases as the quantity of mail increases. The whole of the payment made out of the Post Office Vote to the contracting companies is paid exclusively in respect of postal services. It is estimated that in the year 1907 the payment made for the conveyance of letters and other articles exceeded by about £1,500 the sum which would have been paid under Postal Union rates. In so far as a higher payment is made in respect of the use of British than of German or American vessels the explanation is not that the excess is paid for a non-postal service, but that it is the consideration for contractual obligations of speed and regularity, etc., which do not rest on the owners of vessels, whether foreign or British, which are not under contract with His Majesty's Government.

Death of Harry Haigh on Great Central Railway.

MR. CLYNES (Manchester, N.E.): To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has a record of the accident which caused the death of Harry Haigh, employed by Great Central Railway, Ducie Street, Manchester, on 10th April, 1908; whether the record shows that the accident was due to Haigh acting as both horse-shunter and brakesman, and for want of room to work in; and what was the certified cause of death.

(Answered by Mr. Churchill.) The verdict of the coroner's jury in this case was that Haigh had been accidentally crushed between a horse and a railway van. An inquiry was held on behalf of the Board of Trade, and I am forwarding to my hon. friend a copy of the sub-inspecting officer's report, together with a copy of the railway company's reply to his recommendations.

Service Rifle—Muzzle Velocity, etc.

MR. COURTHOPE (Sussex, Rye): To ask the Secretary of State for War what breech pressure is exerted by the .303 ammunition producing a muzzle velocity of 2,600 foot seconds with a bullet of 150 grains; and what are the length in calibre of the point of the bullet, the point-blank range, the ballistic coefficient, the time of flight for 1,000 yards, and the deflection at 1,000 yards for a wind of ten miles per hour.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Haldane.)

As regards breech pressure, a mean pressure not exceeding  $18\frac{1}{4}$  tons would be exerted. No pattern of 150-grain bullet has yet been decided upon, and it is not therefore practicable to give any information as regards the length in calibre of the point of the bullet or the ballistic coefficient. As regards point-blank range, the range in which a 150-grain bullet, at 2,600 f.s. velocity, would not rise more than five feet above the line of sight would be about 700 yards. The time of flight for 1,000 yards would be about two seconds (calculated), but this varies with different designs. The deflection at 1,000 yards for a wind of ten miles per hour would be about  $12\frac{1}{2}$  feet (calculated).

MR. COURTHOPE: To ask the Secretary of State for War what are the point-blank range, the breech pressure, the ballistic coefficient, the time of flight for 1,000 yards, and the deflection at 1,000 yards for a wind of ten miles per hour, in the case of each of the following types of .303 ammunition: service Lee-Metford, with bullet of 215 grains; Swift, with bullet of 225 grains; Velopex, with bullet of 150 grains, and Lee-Metford Palma, with bullet of 225 grains.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Haldane.)

For the service 215-grain bullet the point-blank range for a height of trajectory above line of sight not exceeding five feet is 550 yards; as regards breech pressure the mean pressure does not exceed  $16\frac{1}{2}$  tons. The ballistic coefficient is .42 approximately; the time of flight for 1,000 yards is 2.4 seconds; the deflection at 1,000 yards for a wind of ten miles an hour is  $13\frac{1}{2}$  feet (calculated). Similar information as regards the three other bullets is not available.

School Attendance—Certificate of District Nurse.

MR. HERBERT (Buckinghamshire, Wycombe): To ask the President of the Board of Education whether he can see his way by regulation to authorise the acceptance of a certificate by a district nurse as to the inability of a child to attend school in country districts owing to the difficulty often experienced of obtaining the certificate of a medical practitioner.

(Answered by Mr. Runciman.) The matter is not dealt with by the Board's regulations. It is for the local education authority in each area to say, in the first instance, what evidence they will accept under the law of school attendance as sufficient to excuse a child from attending school, and in cases of prosecution for non-attendance it is for the magistrates to decide as to the sufficiency of the evidence and excuse.

Discharge of the National Telephone Company's Staff.

MR. CLAUDE HAY (Shoreditch, Hoxton): To ask the Postmaster-General whether, having regard to the fact that the dismissal of thousands of skilled men employed by the National Telephone Company will not only deprive these men of their employment but cause loss of work to those, not part of the company's staff, who are at present engaged in the manufacture and installation of telephone apparatus and material, he will take immediate measures to prevent the discharge of that part of the staff of the National Telephone Company which is engaged upon constructional work needed to meet public wants.

(Answered by Mr. Sydney Buxton.) I think I must refer my hon. friend to the Answers I have given to similar Questions to which, at present, I have nothing to add. I am in negotiation with the National Telephone Company in regard to the question of the continuance of works of construction.

Sorters Performing Higher Duties.

MR. SUMMERBELL (Sunderland): To ask the Postmaster-General if he is aware that a sorter in the London postal service has performed over eighty days duty, from the 1st January to the 30th June of the present year, on a superior class, and has just received pay allowance for seventeen days only, and that up to the 10th October he has performed an additional sixty days, for which he has not yet received any allowance; that this case is typical of others; and, if so, whether, in view of the Hobhouse Committee's recommendations, he will say what action he proposes to take in this case.

(Answered by Mr. Sydney Buxton.) The recommendations of the Select Committee as regards substitution upon a higher duty have been adopted, and I shall be glad if the hon. Member will send me the name and office of the sorter to whom he refers, and I will look into the case.

Weekly Payment of Army Pensioners Employed by the Post Office.

MR. SLOAN (Belfast, S.): To ask the Postmaster-General if he can say what are the regulations which compel Army pensioners in the service of the General Post Office to receive the pensions weekly with their employment pay; and if, in the event of such pensioners desiring to receive their pensions quarterly and not with employment pay, such request will be granted.

MR. SLOAN: To ask the Secretary of State for War if he can say under what circumstances Army pensioners under the General Post Office are compelled to accept payment of their Army pensions weekly with their employment pay; and whether, in the event of pensioners so employed desiring to have their pensions paid quarterly, the War Office regulations governing the payment of pensions will be carried out.

(Answered by Mr. Sydney Buxton.) I will answer these two Questions together. The system of paying naval and military pensions weekly with the Post Office employment wages was introduced on the 1st of April, 1900, mainly in the interests of the staff, on the recommendation of an inter-departmental committee. The system works smoothly, and I do not think that exceptions to the arrangement would be advisable. The War Office agreed that their regulations should be waived in the case of pensioners employed by the Post Office.

Increase of Postal Pay at Kirkcaldy.

MR. DALZIEL (Kirkcaldy Burghs): To ask the Postmaster-General whether he is now able to state his decision in regard to the representations that have been made to him for increased pay being granted to the postmen of Kirkcaldy.

(Answered by Mr. Sydney Buxton.) The maximum of the scale for postmen at Kirkcaldy has been raised by 1s. a week, from 24s. to 25s.

Ventilation of the House of Commons.

SIR PHILIP MAGNUS (London University): To ask the First Commissioner of Works whether he can now see his way to take any steps to improve the ventilation of the House by the admission of fresh air through other channels than the floor, over which hundreds of persons tread during the day, bringing with them from the roads particles of organic matter, which, by the system now in operation, are forced into the air and distributed throughout the Chamber.

(Answered by Mr. L. Harcourt.) It has already been shown by the inquiry before the Select Committee upon the subject, that nothing short of a radical reconstruction of the Chamber would permit of an alteration of the system of admitting fresh air at the floor level. It should, however, be borne in mind that, in addition to scrupulous cleanliness, any small extent of vitiation in connection with the present system is probably neutralised by the rapid changes of air.

Continuation of Road from Princes Gate to Bayswater.

CAPTAIN FABER (Hampshire, Andover): To ask the First Commissioner of Works whether, looking at the state of unemployment now existing, he can recommend that the road leading from Princes Gate to Bayswater Road be continued from the Serpentine in a straight line for Paddington Station.

(Answered by Mr. L. Harcourt.) I fear that I am unable to recommend the suggested alteration. I am providing a large amount of work for the unemployed in the royal parks of a more suitable nature than the removal of the gate and lodge which this proposal would involve.

Members' Dinner Bills.

MR. MARKHAM (Northamptonshire, Mansfield): To ask the hon. Member for Mid. Derby, as Chairman of the Kitchen Committee, whether the practice has always been to treat the dinner bills of Members as private; whether he is aware that recently a member of the Kitchen Committee instructed the clerks to search the back files for a particular dinner bill of a Member which had been the subject of public discussion; whether this examination was made by his authority; and, if not, will he issue orders to prevent the repetition of any similar investigation.

(Answered by Sir Alfred Jacoby.) In reply to my hon. friend it is the practice of the Kitchen Committee to treat dinner bills of Members as private. If any breach of this rule has taken place it is without my authority. I have given strict orders that no Member's dinner bill is to be subject to investigation.

Alleged Fraudulent Coal Export Certificate.

MR. WATT (Glasgow, College): To ask the Lord-Advocate whether his attention has been called to the case of a shipment of coal to Barcelona by a firm of coal exporters to the order of J. and P. Coats, Limited, of Paisley, in January last; whether he is aware that in the case a fraudulent certificate was issued by the exporter saying the coal was a specific brand, whereas it was not; whether this practice is a common one in such shipments, and therefore calls for the attention of his Department; whether the Crown Agent in Edinburgh forbade the procurator fiscal from prosecuting in this case; and, if so, will he state to the House the grounds on which such practices are condoned by his Department.

(Answered by Mr. Thomas Shaw.) I beg to refer my hon. friend to the Answer given by me on this subject on Monday last to a Question put by the hon. Member for East St. Pancras, to which I have nothing to add.

Old-Age Pensions—Outdoor Relief Refunded.

MR. LANE-FOX (Yorkshire, W.R., Barkston Ash): To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether receipt of outdoor relief will be held to disqualify a man, otherwise qualified, from the receipt of a pension for old age when such relief has been repaid in full to the guardians on his behalf.

(Answered by Mr. John Burns.) Perhaps I may be allowed to answer this Question. It is with some others which have arisen under the recent Act, and which involve legal considerations receiving attention, but I am not in a position at the moment to give a definite answer with regard to it.

Old-Age Pension Regulations in Australia.

MR. FELL (Great Yarmouth): To ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer if the exemption of furniture from the calculation of the means of applicants for pensions in New Zealand and in the Australian Colonies is provided for in the Pension Acts in force in those Colonies, or is only sanctioned by the instructions issued to the pension officers.

(Answered by Mr. Asquith.) I cannot find any provision either in the New Zealand Act or in the new Commonwealth Act, which would have the effect of exempting the value of furniture owned by a claimant to an old-age pension from inclusion in the calculation of his accumulated property for the purposes of these Acts, nor am I aware that it is exempted.

Boys Employed at Woolwich Arsenal.

VISCOUNT HELMSLEY (Yorkshire, N.R., Thirsk): To ask the Secretary of State for War how many boys between the ages of sixteen and twenty-one are employed at Woolwich Arsenal; what is the nature of their employment; and what proportion of them after the age of twenty-one are employed regularly at the Arsenal.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Haldane.) The numbers are as follows—

Ordnance Factories	-	-	1,158
Chief Inspector	-	-	134
Deputy Director of Ordnance
Stores	-	-	43
Naval Ordnance Officer	-	-	10
Total	-	-	1,345

In the Ordnance Factories the lads are employed in attending to machines and assisting generally in the shops. Some few are employed in the offices. On reaching the age of twenty-one about 50 per cent. of the trade lads are retained, and in addition those lads, not trade lads, who are engaged on special jobs and whose retention is specially approved by the War Office in each case. Of the lads under the chief inspector the majority are employed in gauging and packing small arm ammunition and charges, some in the shops on miscellaneous work and as messengers lads, and the rest in the office. Only those in the office are retained if suitable as vacancies occur in the adult staff, as the remainder are discharged at the age of nineteen, and of those now serving possibly twelve may be retained. In the Deputy Director of Ordnance Stores' stores sixteen are boy writers and twenty-seven boy messengers. About one lad in six is retained as a rule. In the Naval Ordnance office the lads are employed as boy messengers, and all can be employed regularly after the age of twenty-one.

Training of Soldiers on the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway.

MR. HUDSON (Newcastle-on-Tyne): To ask the Secretary of State for War if he can say whether the military men acting as firemen on the engines of the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Company have been withdrawn; and, if so, whether such withdrawal is temporary or permanent.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Haldane.) The soldiers who were undergoing a course of training in locomotive firing on the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway have all been withdrawn. The withdrawal is not permanent, being consequent on the depression of trade now existing in the vicinity of the railway.

MR. HUDSON: To ask the Secretary of State for War if he contemplates engaging any more military men to railway companies for the purposes of training them in railway locomotive work; and, if so, whether he will ensure that they shall not displace the regular men in the service or reduce them below a full week's work and wages.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Haldane.) Yes, Sir. Every opportunity will be taken to train soldiers of the Royal Engineers belonging to the railway companies of that corps in locomotive firing on such of the British railways as can, from time to time, afford facilities for the above training without detriment to the employment of their regular civilian staff.

Automatic Rifles.

MR. COURTHOPE: To ask the Secretary of State for War whether an automatic rifle, fulfilling the necessary requirements of a service weapon, has yet been invented; and what is the estimated period of time which must elapse between the invention of an automatic rifle and the completion of a sufficient number to arm our regular forces.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Haldane.)
As regards the first part of the Question, there are no official details of such a rifle. As regards the second part of the Question, in the absence of the necessary information as regards the rifle, it would be quite impracticable to make even a rough estimate of a period which in this country would depend on so many circumstances.

MR. COURTHOPE: To ask the Secretary of State for War what is the estimated increase of ammunition which the use of an automatic rifle would require to be carried by the soldier, on the regimental and other ammunition carts and mules, by divisional ammunition columns, and in the ammunition park; and whether he has any official reports showing whether such necessary increase, and the consequent increased risk of failure of the supply of ammunition, would counteract the advantages derived from the use of an automatic rifle by infantry in action.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Haldane.)
As I have no official information as regards the rifle I am not in a position to give any estimate as regards the ammunition necessary.

The Lee-Enfield Rifle.

MR. COURTHOPE: To ask the Secretary of State for War whether experiments have been conducted with a view to so altering the breech mechanism, magazine, and chamber of the service Lee-Enfield rifle that up-to-date ammunition with a powerful charge of fast-burning powder and a pointed ogival bullet may be used, in order that British troops may be armed with a rifle and ammunition not inferior to that of other nations; and, if not, whether he will give instructions for such experiments to be carried out forthwith.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Haldane.)
As I have already explained to the House, experiments are now being made with the view of obtaining ammunition of the kind indicated in the Question.

Use of the Drill Hall, Woolwich for Public Meetings.

MR. CROOKS (Woolwich): To ask the Secretary of State for War whether the Government forbid the letting of the Drill Hall, Woolwich, for public meetings; and, if not, will he communicate this fact to the officer in charge.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Haldane.)
My hon. friend apparently refers to the drill hall of the Second London Royal Field Artillery. The use of the drill hall was refused because the guns and equipment are kept in the hall.

French Ambulance Work at Casa Blanca.

SIR GILBERT PARKER (Gravesend): To ask the Secretary of State for War whether the War Office has in its possession full information as to the mechanical means, such as motor ambulances, which may have been used for transporting the French sick and wounded during the campaigning at Casa Blanca; and, if not, whether he will instruct the Military Attaché at Paris to furnish a Report.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Haldane.)
From information received it would appear that no mechanical transport was used for the carriage of the French sick and wounded during the campaigning at Casa Blanca. Has the hon. Member any information to the contrary effect, and, if so, would he furnish me with it?

SIR GILBERT PARKER: To ask the Secretary of State for War if the War Office has in its possession full particulars as to the methods adopted for treating cases of enteric in the French field-hospitals at Casa Blanca; and, if not, will the War Office think it expedient to instruct the Military Attaché at Paris to procure full particulars.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Haldane.)
I am informed that enteric in the hospital at Casa Blanca was treated on the Brandt or cold-water system.

Housing of Spanish Troops at Casa Blanca.

SIR GILBERT PARKER: To ask the Secretary of State for War if the War

Office has in its possession full particulars as to the methods adopted in the Spanish Army for housing the forces debarked at Casa Blanca, the system of constructing the papier-maché huts, field-kitchen, and hospital, and the cost of construction; and, if not, will the War Office think it expedient to instruct the Military Attaché in Madrid to procure full particulars.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Haldane) The War Office is in possession of information regarding the types of huts used for housing the Spanish troops at Casa Blanca. No detailed information has been received regarding the Spanish field-kitchen or hospital. The latter is a hutment similar to those used as barracks for the troops. The field-kitchens are understood to be of the ordinary type, and it has not been considered necessary to call on our Military Attaché for a special report.

British and Foreign Slates on Aldershot Barracks.

SIR BERKELEY SHEFFIELD (Lincolnshire, Brigg): To ask the Secretary of State for War what number of slates have been used during the last two years for slating the roofs of the barracks at Aldershot; and whether these slates are of foreign or British origin.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Haldane.) 109,170 slates were used, 99,170 being of British origin, and 10,000, approximately, of foreign origin. The latter are being used experimentally.

War Office and Salisbury Plain—Compensation to Labourers for Loss of Employment.

MR GOULDING (Worcester): To ask the Secretary of State for War whether, in connection with the purchase of land in the neighbourhood of Salisbury Plain, he has made any provision for adequate compensation being paid to such aged agricultural labourers as will lose their employment.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Haldane.) As a period of twenty months will elapse between now and the time when the land will be required for military purposes it is hoped that this interval will prove sufficient to enable the labourers to make fresh arrangements where necessary. Should special cases of hardship arise I undertake that they shall be considered with a view to compensation.

Completion of Cavalry Barracks at Colinton.

MAJOR ANSTRUTHER-GRAY (St. Andrews Burghs): To ask the Secretary of State for War whether he can furnish any information as to when the new cavalry barracks at Colinton will be commenced; how many men will be employed on the work; and at what date is it estimated that they will be completed.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Haldane) I am not able at the present moment to give the hon. and gallant Member the information he requires. Will he kindly refer to my reply to a Question on this subject by my hon. friend the Member for Central Edinburgh on Tuesday last?

Re-enlistment in the Territorial Army.

MR. EVELYN CECIL (Ashton Manor): To ask the Secretary of State for War whether it is the intention of the Government that men who have already enlisted in the Territorial Army at its beginning for one year only should be able to enlist again for one year only at their option, on the same conditions as to service and clothing.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Haldane.) Under the Territorial and Reserve Forces Act, Section 9 (1) (c), men may be re-engaged for a period to be prescribed not exceeding four years. This period will, in accordance with paragraph 88 of the Territorial Force Regulations, be fixed by the County Associations. This applies to all re-engagements.

Acquisition of Land for Territorial Army Ranges.

SIR BERKELEY SHEFFIELD: To ask the Secretary of State for War whether he will lay upon the Table a Return specifying the lands to be acquired for Territorial ranges, setting forth the names of the owners and occupying tenants, the acreage of their properties and holdings, and the correspondence which has passed between the War Office and the various people concerned.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Haldane.) It is obviously impracticable to give a Return of the properties concerned before the negotiations are completed. In this respect I propose to follow the practice of my predecessors, and lay Returns of the purchases when completed on the lines of those given in 1898 and 1899.

Reinstatement of Mathew Conroy, of Clonaslee.

MR. DELANY (Queen's County, Ossory): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he can state the reason why the compulsory provisions of the Evicted Tenants Act were not put into operation for the purpose of reinstating Mathew Conroy, the Castle Farm, Clonaslee, Queen's County, and his family, who were evicted within the limit set down under the Act of 1903, and whose farm remains untenanted on the landlord's hands.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) The Estates Commissioners are inquiring into this case with a view to deciding whether they will acquire the lands under the Evicted Tenants Act.

Purchase Agreements on the Estate of R. E. Pigott at Capard.

MR. DELANY: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Estates Commissioners have received an application made on behalf of a number of tenants on the estate of Robert Edward Pigott, Capard, Queen's County, situated at Laccan, Rosenallis, Queen's County, asking to be released from agreements to purchase signed on the 2nd May, 1908, upon the grounds that the stipulated conditions of the bargain reserving to the tenants game, turbary, and free mountain grazing rights were not embodied in the agreements, but on the contrary reserved to the landlord, and further that the agreements were not read over to them, and that their names were attached in ignorance of the contents of those documents; can he say whether the original agreements have been lodged with the Estates Commissioners; and what course they propose taking in this matter.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) The Estates Commissioners have received the application referred to, and will consider it when they are dealing with the purchase agreements which have been lodged with them.

Irish School Teachers—Grants for Increase of Salary.

DR. AMBROSE (Mayo, W.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether it is the intention of the Treasury and Commissioners of National Education to withhold from teachers in charge of schools with an average attendance under thirty-five any portion of the grant of £114,000 which has been voted for the augmentation of the salaries of national school teachers; is he aware that there are at least 3,000 of such schools in Ireland, that the teachers in charge have to do all the work themselves, not as a rule being provided with assistants, and are therefore entitled to their due share of the grant; and whether, seeing that the withholding of the grant from those teachers would inflict a great injustice on them and on the children, he will see that they are secured their due share of it.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) No schools are excluded from participation in the grant.

Provision of Free Meals for School Children.

MR. W. T. WILSON (Lancashire, Westhoughton): To ask the President of the Board of Education whether, when application is made by local authorities to the Board to sanction expenditure from the rates to provide free meals for necessitous school children, the Board has refused its sanction, insisting that voluntary effort must precede the expenditure of public money.

(Answered by Mr. Runciman.) No application which satisfies the requirements of Section 3 of the Provision of Meals Act has been rejected, and I am not aware that the Board of Education have ever assumed the attitude which is indicated by the Question.

Changes in the Coastguard Service.

MR. BELLAIRS (Lynn Regis): To ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether any action is going to be taken on the recommendations of the Inter-departmental Committee Report on the Coastguard; and whether official information will be circulated among the officers and men affected, giving them ample notice of any contemplated changes.

(Answered by Mr. McKenna.) The answer to both parts of the Question is in the affirmative.

Cost of Destroyers.

MR. BELLAIRS: To ask the First Lord of the Admiralty on what basis the Board made the calculation in which they inform the Commonwealth Government that the first cost of six destroyers will be £473,500, or an average of £78,900 each; what type of destroyer does the Board refer to, and what is the speed; and whether the Board took into consideration that the destroyer "Swift" is set down in the Navy Estimates as costing £250,000 and the remaining twelve at least £120,000 each, exclusive of armaments.

(Answered by Mr. McKenna.) The destroyers taken as the basis of the calculation were of the "River" class, which is clearly stated in the Blue-book. The speed is quoted as 25.5 knots.

Post Office—Substitution of Female for Male Labour.

MR. STEADMAN (Finsbury, Central): To ask the Postmaster-General if he will state the number of vacancies on the male establishment of the Post Office that have been filled by females during 1907 and 1908, respectively; and, will he say whether the substitution of female for male labour in his department is one of the causes of the present lack of employment among men.

(Answered by Mr. Sydney Buxton.) In certain cases, from the nature of the work, it was found desirable to substitute women for men. But in the aggregate the increase in the number of posts created for males during the last year has considerably exceeded the number of posts created for females, as my hon. friend will see on comparing the details of the staff employed in the Post Office as given in Appendix F of my Reports for the years 1907 and 1908, which show that the increase in the male staff in 1908 over 1907 was 2,666 against 1,753 in the female staff.

The Provincial Homes Investment Company.

MR. CROSSLEY (Cheshire, Altrincham): To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he is aware of the action being taken against the Provincial Homes Investment Company in Manchester and of the litigation about to ensue, in which the poor investors' money will be spent in defence of the directors; and whether he proposes to take any action in the matter.

(Answered by Mr. Churchill.) It has been brought to my knowledge that there has been litigation in Manchester between the Provincial Homes Investment Company and some of its policy holders or bond holders, but I have no power to intervene in any way.

Estate Duty—Form of Returns.

MR. WHITBREAD (Huntingdonshire, Huntingdon): To ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer what instructions have been issued since 1st January, 1894, up to the present date altering the practice of the Inland Revenue Department as set out in the Paper Inland Revenue (Death Duties), Public Houses, dated 14th May, 1890.

(Answered by Mr. Lloyd George.) No instructions have been issued since 1st January, 1894, altering the practice of the Estate Duty Department of the Board of Inland Revenue.

Leasing of Crown Salmon Fisheries in Scotland.

CAPTAIN ARTHUR MURRAY (Kincardineshire): To ask the Prime Minister whether he is aware that the Woods and Forests Department is endeavouring to arrange to lease Crown salmon fishings in Scotland, hitherto open to the public, to private individuals; and whether, in view of the fact that these fishings are national property and that the Royal Commission of 1895 and 1896 recommended that such fishings should be administered by a district board in order that the public, on payment of a licence, should have the use of them, the Government would consider the propriety of withholding its sanction to the granting of such leases until such time as legislation on the lines recommended by the Commissioners be introduced.

(Answered by Mr. Hobhouse.) The Commissioners of Woods are bound to make the best revenue they can from the Crown property for the benefit of the upon the subject been tendered to the Committee. The Committee have now concluded the taking of evidence, and are considering their Report, which they hope to present shortly.

Sir Ralph Littler.

MR. JOHN WARD : I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has yet completed his inquiry into the recent sentences passed by Sir Ralph Littler at the Middlesex Sessions ; and what action he proposes to take in the matter.

MR. W. THORNE : I beg also to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has completed his inquiries with reference to the sentences passed on two labourers by Sir Ralph Littler at the September Middlesex Sessions, wherein one man was sentenced to three years' penal servitude and two years' police supervision for stealing apples to the value of 1s., and the other was sentenced to twelve months' hard labour for stealing three penny eggs ; and whether he can now see his way clear to order the sentences to be reduced.

MR. GLADSTONE : I find, on inquiry, that Sir Ralph Littler had already decided to reduce the sentence of three years penal servitude to one of eighteen months hard labour, and that his decision had been communicated to the prisoner on 23rd September last. This man had three previous convictions of felony, for which he received sentences of six weeks hard labour, twelve months under the Borstal system, and fifteen months hard labour. Having regard, however, to the nature of his present offence, I propose to communicate with Sir R. Littler with a view to a further reduction of sentence. In the other case the prisoner had no less than nineteen previous convictions, including five of felony, and during the last ten years he has served eleven terms of imprisonment, ranging from fourteen days to three months. He gave notice of appeal against his present sentence, but abandoned it. In view of the criminal record of this man, I cannot think that the sentence of twelve months hard labour is excessive, and I am not prepared to recommend that it should be reduced.

The Aliens Act.

MR. FELL : I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he proposes to amend the instructions issued under the Aliens Act by his Department ; and if it is not possible by such instructions to prevent such evasions of the Act as took place recently at Hull in the case of the four Russian Jews deported as undesirable, but who afterwards got into the country at Hull by another ship.

MR. GLADSTONE : I have nothing to add to my statement last Tuesday that the question which has arisen at Hull is engaging my attention.

MR. FELL : Are the Regulations to be amended ? Does not the right hon. Gentleman consider that the arrival of these undesirables adds to the unemployment difficulty here ?

*MR. GLADSTONE : When I have come to a decision regarding the Hull aliens the hon. Member can put a further Question.

*MR. BYLES (Salford, N.) : When will the House see the annual Report on the working of this inhospitable Act ?

Licensing Compensation Loans.

VISCOUNT HELMSLEY (Yorkshire, N.R., Thirsk) : I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department on what principle he acts in deciding whether to give or withhold his consent to applications from compensation authorities for leave to borrow under subsection 5 of Section 3 of the Licensing Act, 1904.

MR. GLADSTONE : I cannot say more than that I give my careful consideration to all the circumstances of any case in which application is made to me. In certain recent cases I have felt that I should not be justified in giving leave to borrow, which would have the effect of charging the compensation levies for future years with awards of compensation made on a scale which it is one of the objects of the Licensing Bill to replace by a less extravagant scale. If the hon. Member desires to bring any particular case

Fair Wages Clause—Report of Departmental Committee.

MR. W. T. WILSON: To ask the Prime Minister if he can state when the Report of the Departmental Committee appointed to deal with the Fair Wages Clause will be ready.

(Answered by Mr. Asquith.) I am informed that the Report will be ready very shortly.

The Unemployed Proposals.

MR. COURTHOPE: To ask the Prime Minister whether any of his proposals in connection with the question of the unemployed will necessitate immediate legislation.

(Answered by Mr. Asquith.) The Answer is in the negative.

QUESTIONS IN THE HOUSE.

Portsmouth Lock Contract.

MR. RENWICK (Newcastle-on-Tyne): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty what was the relative aggregate cost of British and of foreign granite in the contract for the Portsmouth lock, in regard to which contract the cost of granite to be used is estimated to be about £55,000; and whether will state if the preference given British granite was because it was cheaper than foreign granite.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (MR. MCKENNA, Monmouthshire, N.): The lowest tender for the whole work was accepted, and a successful firm proposes to employ British granite.

MAJOR ANSTRUTHER-GRAY (Andrews Burghs): Will the same course be adopted in the case of Rosyth?

MR. MCKENNA: I am unable to say at present.

The Royal Marines.

CAPTAIN CRAIG (Down, E.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether he can state the strength of all ranks of the Royal Marines, exclusive of bandsmen, on 1st January, 1906, and on 1st October, 1908, respectively.

MR. MCKENNA: The total strength of all ranks of Royal Marines (exclusive of band ranks) on 1st January, 1906, and on 1st October, 1908, was as follows—

The numbers include.	1st January, 1906.	1st October, 1908.
Officers . . . . .	478	465
Warrant officers . . . . .	41	47
Non-commissioned officers and men . . . . .	17,798	16,736
Total . . . . .	18,317	17,248

CAPTAIN CRAIG: Is it the intention of the right hon. Gentleman to reduce still further this valuable branch of the service?

MR. MCKENNA: There is no general intention to reduce the numbers.

CAPTAIN CRAIG: Why has it been so far reduced?

MR. MCKENNA: In order to meet the needs of the Admiralty.

CAPTAIN CRAIG: Then I hope the Admiralty for the time being is satisfied.

New Zealand and Naval Defence.

MR. LONSDALE (Armagh, M.P.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether he is aware that the reply of the Admiralty to the request of the New Zealand Government for a vessel for the purpose of training young New Zealanders for the Navy] has occasioned disappointment and discouragement in the Dominion; and whether he will make further inquiries as to the possibility of acceding to the patriotic desire of the Colony.

MR. McKENNA: It is a matter for sincere regret to me if the answer of the Admiralty has occasioned discouragement in the Dominion, but every inquiry was made at the time with a view to the possibility of meeting the wishes of the Dominion Government. It must be understood that to carry out efficiently the training of as many as 500 boys in a seagoing ship, a very special class of vessel is necessary, and at that time and now, no such vessel in the Royal Navy is available.

MR. LONSDALE: Will the right hon. Gentleman make further inquiries?

MR. McKENNA: I have made every investigation which is possible in the matter.

Australian Commonwealth and Naval Defence.

MR. MENZIES (Lanarkshire, S.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty what was the annual cost to the British taxpayer of the ships of the Imperial Navy in Australian and New Zealand waters, including pay and allowances, victualling, etc., as well as repairs, stores, and depreciation, during the years 1905-6, and 1906-7; what was the amount of the subsidies received from these Colonies, during these two years; and what saving will there be upon that net annual cost when the local flotilla proposed by Mr. Deakin for the Australian Commonwealth, and costing £346,000 per annum, as outlined by the Admiralty 20th August, 1908 [Cd. 4325], is in actual existence.

MR. McKENNA: The cost of maintaining His Majesty's ships in Australian and New Zealand waters during the years 1905-6, and 1906-7, under the heads specified in the hon. Member's Question, was respectively, £514,500, and £607,000. The subsidies from the Australian Commonwealth and New Zealand in respect of the period in question, amounted to £240,000 for each year. It is not possible to state what saving there may be if the scheme proposed by Mr. Deakin be carried out, as this will depend upon the circumstance and requirements at the time.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND (Clare, E.): Can the right hon. Gentleman state whether any definite agreement has been come to between His Majesty's Government and the Government of the Commonwealth with regard to naval affairs in Australia?

MR. McKENNA replied that he thought the hon. Member had seen a copy of some correspondence on the subject. He had nothing to add to that correspondence at the moment.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND: Then an agreement has not yet been finally and definitely come to?

MR. McKENNA: I think at the present moment we are waiting to hear further from the Australian Government on the subject.

Naval Unreadiness for War.

MR. ASHLEY (Lancashire, Blackpool): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether he is aware that on the 9th October, when the crisis in the Near East occurred, only three out of the six battleships of the Mediterranean Fleet were ready for sea; whether this contravenes the Memorandum issued to Parliament to the effect that not more than one battleship of the Mediterranean Fleet should be in dockyard hands or away from it at a time; and whether he is also aware that out of the eight cruisers mentioned in the Navy List only two were fit to accompany the three battleships to sea.

MR. McKENNA: With the exception of one battleship under refit, there was nothing to prevent all the vessels proceeding on service in case of emergency; and the sufficient number of vessels which were required proceeded on the service ordered without delay.

MR. ASHLEY : Am I to understand that every ship except that one was ready at Malta to sail on twelve hours notice ?

MR. McKENNA : Yes, Sir.

MR. BELLAIRS : When the right hon. Gentleman says all were ready, were not two of the cruisers at home in England ?

MR. McKENNA : All were ready that were out there. The question only deals with those at Malta.

MR. ASHLEY : Is it not a fact that one of the cruisers was in dockyard hands, and were not the boilers of two of the battleships defective ?

MR. McKENNA : It is true that some of the machinery of the ships was defective, but those defects would not have prevented those ships going to sea at once.

Naval Construction in Private Yards.

SIR BERKELEY SHEFFIELD (Lincolnshire, Brigg) : I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether he is aware of the official statistics furnished to the House on 9th July, 1906, showing that during the last Government's six years of office there were, on an average seventeen vessels of over 5,000 tons under construction in private yards on 1st April of each year ; and whether he can state how many vessels of over 5,000 tons are at the moment being built for the Royal Navy in the private yards.

MR. McKENNA : I am unable to form an opinion as to which six years of office the hon. Member refers to in the first part of the Question. The reply to the second part of the Question is, five on the 1st of this month.

Dockyard Employees and Territorial Camps.

MR. MILD MAY (Devonshire, Totnes) : I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether it is the intention of His Majesty's dockyard authorities to make to dockyard employees who have attended recent camps as members of the Territorial Army such continued payment in respect of time spent in camp as will provide that they shall not suffer loss as a result of their attendance as members of the Territorial Force.

MR. McKENNA : The matter referred to by the hon. Member is under consideration.

The New Destroyers.

MR. STANIER (Shropshire, Newport) : I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty if he can give the names of the two destroyers bought by the Government to replace the "Gala" and "Tiger;" and whether they equal them in speed, armament, radius of action, and sea-going qualities.

MR. McKENNA : The ships referred to have not yet completed their trials, and consequently have not been adopted into the Royal Navy nor been given names.

MR. STANIER : Are they of the river class ?

MR. McKENNA : They cannot be defined as belonging to any particular class—either the river or the tidal.

MR. STANIER : Did not the right hon. Gentleman himself say they would be in the river class ?

MR. McKENNA : This is a very technical question. So far as we have seen they cannot in all respects be described as belonging to the river class. It all depends on the trials which are still proceeding.

The Channel Fleet.

MR. BELLAIRS : I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether any of the eight battleships absent from the Channel Fleet during the night of the recent Eastern crisis on 9th October were undergoing an extensive refit of over thirty working days.

MR. McKENNA : Some of the battleships were undergoing a refit which, unless interrupted, would last for more than thirty days. None had been paid off into dockyard hands, without a crew, for extensive refit.

MR. BELLAIRS asked why the Memorandum of the Admiralty requiring the replacing of any vessel undergoing extensive refit was not carried out.

MR. McKENNA: These vessels were not undergoing extensive refit.

MR. BELLAIRS: But the Admiralty themselves have defined extensive refit as thirty working days.

MR. McKENNA replied that the crews were still retained on board, and the refit might have been stopped at any moment and the battleships put to sea within twelve hours.

MR. BELLAIRS: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty with reference to the official statement that the Channel Fleet had eight out of fourteen battleships absent in the dockyards from the beginning of its cruise on 23rd September to 12th October, except for a period of ten days, when nine were absent, whether eight of the battleships were in the dockyards refitting; and if the Board propose to obviate the reduction of strength thus entailed by increasing the number of battleships with the Channel Fleet to seventeen, as was the case in 1905 and 1906.

MR. McKENNA: The suggestion contained in the earlier part of the hon. Member's Question is not correct, and the Admiralty have no intention of increasing the strength of the Channel Fleet.

MR. ASHLEY: Were all these eight battleships ready for sea within twelve hours?

MR. McKENNA: No, some were undergoing extensive refit.

Rosyth.

MAJOR ANSTRUTHER-GRAY (St. Andrews Burghs): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether he can state how many men are now being employed at Rosyth Dock, and in what capacity.

MR. McKENNA: The invitations to tender for the main contract are now being issued. No men can be employed on the work until the contract is made. At present there are on the site, five Admiralty workmen and 107 men employed by the road contractor.

MR. ARTHUR LEE (Hampshire, Fareham): By what date have the contracts to be in?

MR. McKENNA: I will inquire. I think they are to be returned this year.

Khalsa College, Amritsar.

DR. RUTHERFORD (Middlesex, Brentford): I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for India whether he is aware that dissatisfaction prevails among the Sikhs on account of the reorganisation of the governing body of the Khalsa College at Amritsar; was the new constitution framed under instructions from Government; was it objected to by a scion of the Atari house; were people allowed to vote who had not paid their subscriptions as required by the rules; was their readiness to pay, if the new rules were passed, regarded as tantamount to actual payment; and whether he can tell the House what steps the Government of India are taking to dispel this cause of dissatisfaction.

THE UNDER-SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Mr. BUCHANAN, Perthshire, E.): The Secretary of State has no information on the subject, but he will inquire.

Government News Service for India.

MR. J. M. ROBERTSON (Northumberland, Tyneside): I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for India whether the arrangement between the Government of India and the Simla correspondent of the Daily Mail, under which the said correspondent is authorised to provide the Government of India with a daily service of news, has been confirmed or renewed; if so, for what period and at what remuneration; and whether the sanction of the Secretary of State has been given to any such arrangement.

MR. BUCHANAN: The Gentleman with whom the arrangement referred to was made undertook as a condition of the agreement to sever his connection with the Daily Mail, and to supply no news to that or any other paper in the United Kingdom. The arrangement was made for three years from November, 1907, and has been approved by the Secretary of State. The monthly cost is £160, which is to cover all charges for the collection of news.

British Indians in the Transvaal.

MR. J. M. ROBERTSON: I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for India whether he has received during the last few weeks any information from India of the holding there of meetings and expressions in other ways of popular indignation at the treatment of British-Indians in the Transvaal and their imprisonment for declining to take out and carry on their persons registration certificates; and whether His Majesty's Government have taken or propose to take any action in the direction of remedying the grievances complained of.

MR. BUCHANAN: Many representations on this subject are being received from India, where marked feeling has been aroused. They have been communicated to the Colonial Office, who will be able to reply to the latter part of the hon. Member's Question.

MR. LUPTON (Lincolnshire, Sleaford): Has the hon. Gentleman come to the conclusion that as regards British India there is no specific advantage in belonging to the British Empire?

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND (Clare, E.): None whatever.

Cholera.

MAJOR ANSTRUTHER-GRAY (St. Andrews Burghs): I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for India whether his attention has been called to the reported cure for cholera now in use at Shanghai with good results; and whether he will cause inquiries to be made with a view to coping with this disease in India.

MR. BUCHANAN: The Secretary of State has no particulars as to the remedial treatment of cholera reported to be adopted in Shanghai, but will cause inquiries to be made.

Chinese Coolies in the Transvaal.

CAPTAIN CRAIG: I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies if he can state the number of Chinese coolies at present employed in the mines in the Transvaal.

THE UNDER-SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Colonel SEELY, Liverpool, Abercromby): I understand that there were 14,655 on the 30th September.

CAPTAIN CRAIG asked if these 14,655 coolies were still confined in compounds under "conditions of slavery."

COLONEL SEELY: Yes, they are still confined to compounds, but this bad system is rapidly being brought to an end. There appears to be no one in the British Empire who supports it, except a few hon. Members on the other side.

SIR GILBERT PARKER (Gravesend): Are not the natives in the Transvaal confined in compounds?

COLONEL SEELY: Yes, Sir, but under wholly different conditions.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND: Who invented this system of compounds?

MR. ASHLEY: Will the Under-Secretary state what are these different conditions?

COLONEL SEELY: It is obviously impossible, within the limits of Question and Answer, to make clear the difference which has been explained again and again in the House.

MR. KEIR HARDIE (Merthyr Tydvil): Is not the difference rather in the terms of contract than in the compound system?

*MR. SPEAKER: It is not desirable to have a discussion on this matter.

Chinese Coolies and Opium.

MR. SMEATON (Stirlingshire): I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether, seeing that the Transvaal Opium Ordinance was sed solely in order to provide for needs of the Chinese coolies, and if these coolies are being repatriated, in view of the consequences likely follow if the natives of the Transvaal become addicted to the opium habit, His Majesty's Government intend to advise the Transvaal Government to rescind the Ordinance when all the Chinese coolies have been repatriated.

COLONEL SEELY: The Ordinance was passed because the previously existing legislation was not sufficiently stringent, and its repeal therefore would seem to be undesirable. The question, however, is one for the Transvaal Government, in whose hands I feel assured that the interests of the natives in this matter are safe.

Sleeping Sickness.

MR. REES (Montgomery Boroughs): I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether, with reference to the First Report of the research expedition sent out to Central Africa by the Liverpool School of Tropical Medicine to the effect that Glossina palpalis is not the only carrier of sleeping sickness, and to the fact that Glossina morsitans is found all over Nyassaland, the Government is taking special steps to prevent the further spread of sleeping sickness southwards to Nyassaland.

COLONEL SEELY: I regret to say that a telegram has been recently received from the Governor of Nyassaland reporting that sleeping sickness has appeared in that Protectorate. Steps are being taken to deal with the matter, the importance of which is and has been fully realised both by the Secretary of State and the Governor.

Charge of Ill-treating Native Children.

MR. J. M. ROBERTSON: I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether his attention has been directed to proceedings in the St. Albans Divisional Sessions on the 10th instant, when the wife of the Chief Justice of Southern Nigeria was convicted of cruelly beating one of four native girls in her employ, who had been entrusted to the Chief Justice as liberated slaves, to be under his guardianship until they are twenty-one years of age, the girl flogged being only about thirteen years old, and when both he and the defendant asserted their right to administer this and severer punishment; whether the conditions under which these wards were entrusted to the Chief Justice authorise, either in England or in Southern Nigeria, the treatment condemned in a British Court of law, the right to continuance of which was asserted both by the legal guardian of the child and by the defendant; and, if so, whether His Majesty's Government will take steps to procure withdrawal of these wards from the guardianship of the Chief Justice of Southern Nigeria, and also such modifications of existing regulations as will protect other liberated slaves from similar treatment in West Africa and elsewhere in British Dominions.

COLONEL SEELY: The wife of the Chief Justice of Southern Nigeria was convicted of a common assault upon one of these native girls, and I must say at once that, although the magistrates were able to allow the existence of certain extenuating circumstances, the Secretary of State deeply regrets that the name of an important judicial officer should be connected with a case of such a painful description. The whole circumstances of the case are under the consideration of the Secretary of State. The Secretary of State is also dealing with the subject matter of the second paragraph of my hon. friend's Question, and my hon. friend may rest assured that the conditions (upon which some communication with the Gold Coast may be necessary) will not be allowed to continue if they disclose any right to inflict upon a ward such treatment as that described in the first part of the Question. The Secretary of State is also taking steps to secure that these girls shall be sent back to the Colony and that their settlement there shall be arranged under the supervision of the Governor or some other suitable authority.

East African Steamship Service.

MR. LONSDALE: I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether the mails to and from British East Africa are carried in British, French, or German vessels; whether Government material intended for public works in this Colony is being despatched in foreign bottoms contrary to the regulations made by the late Government; and what steps are being taken to encourage British shipping on the East African route.

COLONEL SEELY: Mails to and from British East Africa are carried indifferently in British, French, or German vessels. Shipments of Government material are, in accordance with general practice, carried in British bottoms as far as possible, and shipments in foreign vessels are only made in cases of urgency when no British ship is available. I am not aware that any special regulations were made on this subject by the late Government. In reply to the last part of the Question, I would refer the hon. Member to the reply given to a question addressed to me by the hon. Member for Montgomery District on 19th October.

In reply to the further Question, the hon. Gentleman admitted that the German line was subsidised.

British Indians in the Transvaal.

DR. RUTHERFORD: I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether seeing that, whereas immigration of our Indian fellow-subjects into the late Transvaal Republic was unrestricted save for the payment of a £3 entrance fee, the Government of the Transvaal Colony have refused to modify recently enacted legislation even to the extent of allowing a maximum of six highly-educated professional Indians in any one year; and whether, in order to renew wastage among the domiciled Indian community and to maintain their healthy existence as a community, His Majesty's Government will make friendly representations to the Government of the Transvaal recommending them to make this small concession.

COLONEL SEELY: The Act recently passed, the full text of which with the correspondence leading up to it will be found in the Blue-Book [Cd. 4327], has received the assent of the Crown and the Secretary of State is not prepared to press the Transvaal Government to amend it. Various questions, however, have arisen with regard to the administration of the Act and the Secretary of State is in friendly communication with the Transvaal Government on the subject.

MR. HAROLD COX (Preston): I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether British-Indians who acquired rights of domicile in the Transvaal in the days of the late Republic are still precluded from acquiring civil rights, may not own fixed property, are liable to removal into special locations, and must carry on their personal registration certificates containing descriptions of their personal peculiarities, details of their families, and their thumb impressions; and whether he can inform the House in what respect the pre-war grievances of our Indian fellow-subjects in the Transvaal have been remedied since the annexation of that country.

COLONEL SEELY: The British Indians in the Transvaal are subject to a number of disabilities, but my hon. friend's statement of them is a little too general in its terms, as they are entitled to own fixed property within Asiatic locations. His Majesty's Government have been and still are in friendly communication with the Transvaal Government with regard to these disabilities. The grievance which was the principal subject of complaint before the war was that Indians were liable to be confined to locations for purposes of trade. This, therefore, with some minor grievances, has been removed since the annexation.

The Congo State.

*SIR CHARLES W. DILKE (Gloucestershire, Forest of Dean): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether any information can be placed before the House as to the position of negotiations with Belgium regarding the Congo State, and, in particular, whether the promised reply of His Majesty's Government to the last-published Belgian despatch has been delivered, and, if not, when it may be expected to be sent, and whether the Belgian Government has given any assurance as to radical alteration in the administration of the Congo Territory other than the general assurance considered insufficient by His Majesty's Government.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir EDWARD GREY, Northumberland, Berwick): The reply of His Majesty's Government to the last published communication from the Belgian Government is still under consideration, and will be decided as soon as possible. No assurances beyond those already published have been received from the Belgian Government.

The Proposed European Conference.

CAPTAIN FABER (Hampshire, Andover): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs if he can state whether the first proposal for a Conference of the European Powers came from Turkey to England; and whether the first object of the Conference will be to compensate Turkey for the infringement of her rights and to make such arrangements as will strengthen the new Government system in the Ottoman Empire.

MR. LYNCH (Yorkshire, W.R., Ripon): At the same time may I ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the proposals recommended by His Majesty's Government for submission to the contemplated Conference of the Powers were supported by or have received the approval of the newly-constituted Turkish Government; and whether he can state the nature of these proposals.

SIR EDWARD GREY: The object of the communications now taking place between the Powers is to secure some agreement on a programme which, without widening the area of disturbance, shall arrive at a settlement of the difficulties which have been created by recent events. As Turkey is the Power most adversely affected by what has taken place, His Majesty's Government trust that the first object of the Powers will be to secure compensation to Turkey, to safeguard her interests, and to strengthen the new régime in Turkey, the initiation of which produced such beneficial results in the administration of the Turkish Empire. The approval of the Turkish Government is a necessary condition for the adoption of any programme for a Conference, and as their views have not yet been expressed upon the suggestions which have been made, I can make no further statement about these. The proposal for a Conference was made in the first place by Turkey, but the idea of a Conference was suggested at about the same time from more than one quarter.

MR. LYNCH: May I ask whether, in view of the great importance of this subject, the right hon. Gentleman cannot see his way to make to Parliament a clear statement defining the proposals made by His Majesty's Government?

SIR EDWARD GREY: I think it would be premature to make any statement about the proposals of any individual Power. The object of the communications between the Powers, in which of course Turkey is included, is to ascertain their own views before making anything public.

Siam.

MR. MITCHELL-THOMSON (Lanarkshire, N.W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he is in a position to give further information with regard to the negotiations with Siam.

SIR EDWARD GREY: His Majesty's Government have under their consideration a Report prepared by His Majesty's Minister at Bangkok on certain points in regard to which they desired information; but I am not yet in a position to make any further statement on the subject of the negotiations.

Egypt.

MR. J. M. ROBERTSON: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether his attention has been called to the demand of a number of Egyptian politicians for Egyptian representation in the proposed constitutional assembly for Turkey; and whether, in view of this demand, he will urge upon the British Consul-General at Cairo the expediency of strengthening the constitutional element in the Government of Egypt.

SIR EDWARD GREY: During this year a scheme for representative provincial Councils is being elaborated in Egypt, and I cannot add to the general statement of policy already made at the opening of this session.

MR. J. M. ROBERTSON: Does not the right hon. Gentleman consider that this new development will create difficulty with regard to British administration in Egypt?

SIR EDWARD GREY: I see no signs of that whatever.

DR. RUTHERFORD: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether His Majesty's Government are in a position to state when they will recommend His Highness the Khedive to start Parliamentary institutions in Egypt.

SIR EDWARD GREY: I beg to refer the hon. Member to the answer I have just given to the hon. Member for Tyne-side.

Macedonia.

MR. LYNCH: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the members of the Financial Commission in Macedonia are at present exercising their functions; and whether any change is contemplated as regards the future of this Commission as a result of recent events in Turkey.

SIR EDWARD GREY: The answer to the first Question is in the affirmative. No change is in contemplation at present.

Welsh Slate Quarries.

SIR BERKELEY SHEFFIELD (Lincolnshire, Brigg): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he can give the number of quarrymen employed in the Welsh slate quarries as compared with those employed ten years ago.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. Gladstone, Leeds, W.): I beg to answer this question on behalf of my right hon. friend. The number of persons employed in the Welsh slate quarries in the years

1897 and 1907, respectively, are as follows—

Year.	Inside the Quarries.	Outside the Quarries.	Total.
1897	3,861	5,220	9,081
1907	3,363	5,071	8,434

Portsmouth Lock Fatality.

MR. JOHN WARD (Stoke-on-Trent): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to the case of a man named C. J. Vowels who was killed by accident while working on the new lock, Portsmouth Dockyard; whether his Department was represented at the inquest on Wednesday, 14th October; and whether any Report has been made upon the subject by the district factory inspector.

MR. GLADSTONE: I find, on inquiry, that the inspector received notice of the accident, and attended the inquest, but the accident proved to be one which, as it happened on an engineering work, is outside the present jurisdiction of the Factory Department. The question of accidents on engineering works is dealt with in the Building Operations and Engineering Works Bill, now before Parliament.

The Truck Act.

MR. JOHN WARD: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he can say whether the Departmental Committee upon the question of truck have asked for any evidence upon the deductions of wages from workmen employed upon public works in course of construction; and whether they have now closed the taking of evidence; and, if so, at about what date are they expected to issue their Report.

MR. GLADSTONE: I am informed that no complaints have reached the Truck Committee in regard to deductions from the wages of workmen employed upon public works in course of construction, nor has any offer of evidence upon the subject been tendered to the Committee. The Committee have now concluded the taking of evidence, and are considering their Report, which they hope to present shortly.

Sir Ralph Littler.

MR. JOHN WARD : I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has yet completed his inquiry into the recent sentences passed by Sir Ralph Littler at the Middlesex Sessions ; and what action he proposes to take in the matter.

MR. W. THORNE : I beg also to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has completed his inquiries with reference to the sentences passed on two labourers by Sir Ralph Littler at the September Middlesex Sessions, wherein one man was sentenced to three years' penal servitude and two years' police supervision for stealing apples to the value of 1s., and the other was sentenced to twelve months' hard labour for stealing three penny eggs ; and whether he can now see his way clear to order the sentences to be reduced.

MR. GLADSTONE : I find, on inquiry, that Sir Ralph Littler had already decided to reduce the sentence of three years penal servitude to one of eighteen months hard labour, and that his decision had been communicated to the prisoner on 23rd September last. This man had three previous convictions of felony, for which he received sentences of six weeks hard labour, twelve months under the Borstal system, and fifteen months hard labour. Having regard, however, to the nature of his present offence, I propose to communicate with Sir R. Littler with a view to a further reduction of sentence. In the other case the prisoner had no less than nineteen previous convictions, including five of felony, and during the last ten years he has served eleven terms of imprisonment, ranging from fourteen days to three months. He gave notice of appeal against his present sentence, but abandoned it. In view of the criminal record of this man, I cannot think that the sentence of twelve months hard labour is excessive, and I am not prepared to recommend that it should be reduced.

The Aliens Act.

MR. FELL : I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he proposes to amend the instructions issued under the Aliens Act by his Department ; and if it is not possible by such instructions to prevent such evasions of the Act as took place recently at Hull in the case of the four Russian Jews deported as undesirable, but who afterwards got into the country at Hull by another ship.

MR. GLADSTONE : I have nothing to add to my statement last Tuesday that the question which has arisen at Hull is engaging my attention.

MR. FELL : Are the Regulations to be amended ? Does not the right hon. Gentleman consider that the arrival of these undesirables adds to the unemployment difficulty here ?

*MR. GLADSTONE : When I have come to a decision regarding the Hull aliens the hon. Member can put a further Question.

*MR. BYLES (Salford, N.) : When will the House see the annual Report on the working of this inhospitable Act ?

Licensing Compensation Loans.

VISCOUNT HELMSLEY (Yorkshire, N.R., Thirsk) : I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department on what principle he acts in deciding whether to give or withhold his consent to applications from compensation authorities for leave to borrow under subsection 5 of Section 3 of the Licensing Act, 1904.

MR. GLADSTONE : I cannot say more than that I give my careful consideration to all the circumstances of any case in which application is made to me. In certain recent cases I have felt that I should not be justified in giving leave to borrow, which would have the effect of charging the compensation levies for future years with awards of compensation made on a scale which it is one of the objects of the Licensing Bill to replace by a less extravagant scale. If the hon. Member desires to bring any particular case under my notice I shall be glad to consider it.

The Unemployed.

MR. GOULDING (Worcester): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade what is the percentage of unemployed trades unionists in Germany and the United Kingdom according to the latest available figures.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Mr. CHURCHILL, Dundee): I can give no comparative figures for reasons repeatedly explained in Answers to Questions in this House and fully set out in Appendix IX. to the recent Report [Cd. 4032] on Conditions in Germany.

EARL WINTERTON (Sussex, Horsa-ham) asked the right hon. Gentleman whether his attention had been called to the speech of one of his colleagues, in which he stated that there was more unemployment in Germany than in England, and whether the hon. Gentleman, when he made that statement, was in possession of official figures.

MR. CHURCHILL: My attention has not been called to the speech. But there is a discrepancy in the statement. According to my information there is at present more unemployment in this country than in Germany.

MR. RENWICK (Newcastle-on-Tyne): May I remind the right hon. Gentleman of the speeches made by his own colleagues during the Newcastle election?

*MR. SPEAKER: I must remind the hon. Member, though he was formerly a Member of the House, that it is not permissible to make statements at Question-time.

Railway Companies' Political Subscriptions.

LORD R. CECIL (Marylebone, E.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade when he proposes to introduce the promised Bill for the purpose of forbidding statutory corporations to make contributions out of their funds towards political contests.

MR. CHURCHILL: I am not able at present to make any statement on this subject. I may, however, inform the noble Lord that Returns have been obtained from the railway companies giving details of their subscriptions to institutions and associations of various characters not under the control of the individual companies during the year 1907, and it is proposed to lay these particulars on the Table of the House.

The Milk Bill.

MR. COURTHOPE: I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board when the Milk Bill will be introduced.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. JOHN BURNS, Battersea): I am afraid I cannot at present fix a date for this purpose.

MR. COURTHOPE: Will it be this session?

MR. JOHN BURNS: At any rate I hope it will be printed.

MR. WATT: Will the Bill apply to Scotland?

MR. JOHN BURNS: That Question should be addressed to the Scottish Local Government Board.

Old-Age Pensions.

MR. W. THORNE: I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether his attention has been called to the Carlisle Board of Guardians proposing a grant of 5s. weekly to the deserving poor above seventy years of age in consequence of the Old-Age Pension Act inflicting hardships in disqualifying paupers and whether it is the intention of the Local Government Board to prevent the Carlisle Board of Guardians carrying out their proposals.

MR. JOHN BURNS: My attention has been called to this matter. I do not think it would be a proper exercise of the powers of the guardians to order a fixed weekly sum as out-relief to all persons above a certain age to whom that form of relief is given. The amount of the relief in any particular case should be determined by the necessities of that case. Although in some instances the conditions might be such that the proposed relief would be needed, in others this would not be so, and in the latter cases the additional relief could not properly be given. I have informed the guardians accordingly.

Consumptive Sanatoria.

MR. HIGHAM (Yorkshire, W.R., Sowerby): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board if he will issue a circular to local authorities, especially boroughs, pointing out the wisdom of contributing to the upkeep of consumption sanatoria, either by annual contribution or by a sum per capita, according to the number of sufferers from tuberculosis the authority may send to the sanatorium for treatment.

MR. JOHN BURNS: I propose to issue an Order to provide for the notification to medical officers of health of pauper cases of pulmonary tuberculosis, and I also propose, when sending copies of the Order to the sanitary authorities, to draw their attention to the administrative action which can be taken in connection with such matters as that referred to in the Question. This will, I hope meet the object which my hon. friend has in view.

The Motor Car Act, 1903.

MR. CATHCART WASON (Orkney and Shetland): I beg to ask the Prime Minister if he is aware of the feeling of dissatisfaction that prevails in the country owing to the action of a section of the community habitually and determinedly disregarding the speed-limit imposed by the Motor Car Act, 1903, and especially the abuse and offensive terms applied to police and magistrates for trying to enforce the said limitation; and if, in view of the necessity of the matter and also the difficulties connected with legislation, he would appoint a Committee of the House, representing impartially the different views held on the subject, to suggest legislation that might be passed by consent,

MR. JOHN BURNS: The Prime Minister has asked me to reply to this Question. I am aware of the feeling on the subject to which it relates. I am afraid that my hon. friend is too sanguine in thinking that the various interests concerned would agree to legislative proposals in connection with this matter, and hence it does not seem to me that there would be likely to be advantage in the appointment of a Committee as suggested. My hon. friend is perhaps aware that I have recently issued a circular to local authorities drawing attention to the existing law and pressing upon them the importance of its enforcement. I am also in consultation with my right hon. friend the Home Secretary with regard to the feasibility of further action.

MR. MARKHAM (Nottinghamshire, Mansfield): Is the right hon. Gentleman not aware that the regulations issued by his Department are habitually and daily broken in every street in London?

MR. JOHN BURNS: If that be so, the responsibility rests with the local authority. The London County Council would be doing its duty by making representations to me on this matter, when the Home Secretary and I would do all we could to act most promptly and effectually in limiting speed or doing anything reasonable to protect life and property.

MR. MARKHAM: The County Council has nothing whatever to do with these Regulations; they are in the hands of the Home Secretary.

MR. JOHN BURNS: In that case I urge my hon. friend to address the Question to the Home Secretary.

MR. MARKHAM: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that whenever a Question is addressed to the Home Secretary he refers me to the President of the Local Government Board?

MR. JOHN BURNS: On behalf of myself and my right hon. friend I shall be pleased to answer any Question of which notice has been given. We have no desire to evade criticism or to burke discussion.

Precautions against Influenza.

SIR PHILIP MAGNUS (London University): To ask the Prime Minister whether, in view of the possible recurrence of the influenza epidemic during the approaching winter months, he will reconsider the question of the adjournment of the House for a half-hour, between the hours of seven and nine, in order that the windows may be opened for the admission of fresh air and the better ventilation of the Chamber.

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (Mr. L. HARCOURT, Lancashire, Rossendale): Without expressing any opinion as to the advisability of the suggestion in connection with the possibility of a recurrence of the influenza epidemic, I would point out that, as explained on many previous occasions, the system of mechanical ventilation does not lend itself to the opening of windows. A much better result can be obtained by running the appliances at full speed during an adjournment; but even this requires to be very judiciously done in the winter season, otherwise it might be difficult to "catch-up" the lowered temperature which would necessarily result in severe weather. The matter of an adjournment or a recurrence to the old informal break in the sitting is one which the Prime Minister could only consider if he was convinced that it represented a great weight of opinion in all quarters of the House.

MR. PIRIE (Aberdeen, N.) asked the right hon. Gentleman whether he had read the pamphlet by the hon. Member for North Bucks, in which it was stated that though the ventilation might be the best in the world the result of it was the worst known, and whether he would take steps to pay attention to this matter.

MR. L. HARCOURT: I have perused the pamphlet, but I have not arrived at the same conclusion.

SIR PHILIP MAGNUS suggested the consideration of an alteration in the present mechanical system of ventilation in order, if possible, to open the windows.

Hop Cultivation.

MR. COURTHOPE: I beg to ask the hon. Member for South Somerset, as representing the President of the Board of Agriculture, how many acres of hops have been cultivated this year and in 1907 in Great Britain; and whether so great a decrease in acreage has been recorded in any previous year.

THE PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. J. A. PEASE, Essex, Saffron Walden, for Sir EDWARD STRACHEY): The acreage under hops this year was 38,921 acres, as compared with 44,938 acres in 1907, a decrease of 6,019 acres. The decrease in 1887 as compared with 1886 was as much as 6,421 acres.

Unpicked Hops.

MR. COURTHOPE: I beg to ask the hon. Member for South Somerset, as representing the President of the Board of Agriculture, how many acres of hops have this year been left unpicked owing to the disastrous state of the hop market.

MR. J. A. PEASE (for Sir EDWARD STRACHEY): It is estimated that some 3,500 acres of hops have from one cause or another been left unpicked this year.

Wallsend Small Holdings Society.

MR. GEORGE ROBERTS (Norwich): I beg to ask the hon. Member for South Somerset, as representing the President of the Board of Agriculture, whether his attention has been drawn to an application made by the Wallsend Small Holdings Society, Limited, to the Northumberland County Council for 212 acres of land; and whether he can state what steps are being taken to provide the land thus applied for.

MR. J. A. PEASE: The Board have been in communication with the Northumberland County Council on this subject, and they are informed that the Council have instructed their land agent to ascertain whether any suitable land is available for satisfying the requirements of the society.

Small Holdings in Kent.

MR. GEORGE ROBERTS: I beg to ask the hon. Member for South Somerset, as representing the President of the Board of Agriculture, whether he can state if the Board or the Kent County Council has succeeded in providing a small holding for David Nicholls, against whom an eviction warrant was made by a bench of magistrates sitting at Tonbridge, on 20th July last, upon the application of Nicholls' landlord, the reason alleged being that Nicholls had applied for land under the Small Holdings Act.

MR. J. A. PEASE: It has not, I am sorry to say, been found possible as yet to provide a small holding for Mr. Nicholls, but the acquisition of a farm for the purpose of providing small holdings is under the consideration of the county council, and this would enable them to comply with his application.

MR. MORRELL (Oxfordshire, Henley) asked if there was anything to prevent the Board of Agriculture taking action in this case?

MR. J. A. PEASE said he did not think they should interfere until, at any rate, there had been an opportunity of acquiring the farm.

Small Holdings in England and Wales.

MR. R. HARCOURT (Montrose Burghs): I beg to ask the hon. Member for South Somerset, as representing the President of the Board of Agriculture, if he will now state the acreage of land acquired under the Small Holdings Act by each county in England and Wales separately.

MR. J. A. PEASE: The following table gives the information for which my hon. friend asks—

Scottish Valuation Assessors.

MR. WATT: I beg to ask the Secretary for Scotland whether he is aware that many valuation assessors for counties in Scotland are resident many miles from the towns and burghs where their work of assessing for valuation has to be done; that it is in many instances impossible for these officials to even see the premises which they are called upon to value; and whether in these circumstances he will appoint local assessors in each town or burgh and divide among these the salaries at present paid to men resident in burghs inconveniently situated for carrying on the work.

MR. SINCLAIR: No complaints in the sense suggested have reached me. With regard to the latter part of the Question I may remind my hon. friend that the appointment of local assessors does not rest with me but with county and town councils.

Scotch Crofters Commission.

*MR. COCHRANE (Ayrshire, N.): I beg to ask the Secretary for Scotland what is the total expenditure from 1886-7 to 1906-7 on the Crofters Commission, including salaries, travelling expenses, incidental expenses, and remuneration to sheriff clerks; what is the number of fair rents, of inspections, of applications for enlargement of holdings, of appeals, and miscellaneous applications disposed of in the same period by the Crofters Commission; and what is the average cost of fixing the fair rents.

THE SECRETARY FOR SCOTLAND (MR. SINCLAIR, Forfarshire): The total cost of the Commission since its establishment in 1886 to 31st March, 1907, has been £123,976 3s. The number of fair rent applications, including applications for revaluation of holdings, disposed of down to 31st December, 1907, has been 20,892, but to arrive at the average cost in each case it is necessary to add other applications under the Act, during the same period, most of which occupied more time in disposing of them than double the number of ordinary fair rent cases would have occupied. These were 3,561 applications for enlargement of holdings; 428 miscellaneous applications (including applications by landlords for resumption of parts of crofter holdings, and under which upwards of 1,000 crofters were called as respondents); 105 applications to sist proceedings for removal; 707 applications to prohibit the sale of crofters effects upon their holdings; 250 applications under the Crofters Common Grazings Regulation Act, 1891; and 1,191 appeals under the Delegation of Powers Act, 1888; or a total of 27,134 applications disposed of. These figures show an average cost of £4 11s. 4½d. for each case.

*MR. COCHRANE: Has the attention of the right hon. Gentleman been called to a statement by the Prime Minister on the authority of the Lord Advocate to the effect that the cost of fixing fair rents worked out at an average of 1s. 6d., while the right hon. Gentleman himself has just stated that the average cost of fixing fair rents by the Crofters Commission is £4 11s. 4½ for each case! Can he explain the discrepancy?

MR. SINCLAIR: The comparison was not made on the same basis.

*MR. COCHRANE: Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman will see that the Lord Advocate is supplied with correct figures in the future.

MR. COCHRANE: I beg to ask the Secretary for Scotland if he will state for each year, 1902-3, 1903-4, 1904-5, 1905-6, 1906-7, the number of fair rents fixed by the Crofters Commission, the cost of the salaries, travelling, and all other expenses incurred by the Crofters Commission, the amount of the rents dealt with and the sum by which they were reduced, and the amount of arrears which were cancelled, respectively.

MR. SINCLAIR: The information desired by the hon. Member is as follows—

Ballyreen Disturbances.

MR. HALPIN (Clare, W.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that, when fifty young men in Doolin, Toglea, Ballinalicken, and Lisdoonvarna were informed that they would be arrested on the charge of cattle-driving, they walked in a body to Ballyreen police barrack and gave themselves into the charge of the sergeant, and that the same young men and their friends when they were walking quietly to the petty sessions Court at Ennistymon were met outside the town by a large body of police, who, without any provocation, tore the flag from them when they saw the inscription on it of "The Land for the People. Down with the Landlord Ranchers;" and will he say why this action was taken by the police.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. BIRRELL, Bristol, N.): I have already dealt fully with this incident in my reply to the Hon. Member's Question of the 15th instant. I am informed by the constabulary authorities that when the police properly prevented this disorderly procession from approaching the courthouse, the crowd attacked the police with sticks and stones, knocking down and injuring five constables. It was only then that the police charged the crowd with batons and took possession of the banner. It is the fact that the young men gave themselves up in the first instance, but this fact affords no excuse for the subsequent misconduct of these men and their friends in approaching the courthouse in a disorderly and intimidatory manner.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman if his attention has been called to the allegation made of what is described as a disorderly procession, but which is simply the men summoned going to the courthouses freely in order to stand their trial on the charge made against them, and might I ask whether his attention has been called to the complaints of the police made by several priests in the district, and other responsible persons, who entirely deny the facts as stated by the right hon. Gentleman, and whether he will, under these circumstances, and in view of the character of the gentlemen who dispute the description given by the police, order an inquiry to be made!

MR. BIRRELL: I have made full inquiries, and am fully satisfied of the truth and accuracy of the statements made by the police.

MR. LONSDALE (Armagh, Mid.): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the young men concerned in this cattle-drive were following the advice of the hon. Member?

MR. MOORE (Armagh, N.): May I ask what steps the Government took with regard to the assault committed by the crowd of patriots on the police?

MR. BIRRELL: I think considerable steps were taken.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND: Will the right hon. Gentleman say whether, if I furnish him with written complaints as to the action of the police by the priests and other responsible people in the neighbourhood, he will consider those statements?

MR. BIRRELL: I am always prepared to consider any statement made authoritatively by responsible persons.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND: Then I will get them.

Irish Land Purchase.

MR. SHEEHAN (Cork County, Mid): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to the action of various landowners in Ireland who have been cutting up their demesnes and other untenanted land, dividing them into strips of 20, 30, or 40 acres, placing a rent on these and then offering them for public auction stating, as an additional inducement for high investment, that incoming tenants can purchase under the Land Act of 1903; whether this policy of the creation of new tenancies on untenanted land by the payment of extravagant competitive fines is ever favoured by the Government or the Estates Commissioners; will steps be taken in the promised land legislation to deal with this evil in the Irish land system; and will he say whether sales, under the Purchase Act, to tenants created by this extraordinary method of public auction will be facilitated by the Estates Commissioners, as is at present assumed in every instance and so set forth in their auction advertisements by the selling owners.

MR. BIRRELL: The Estates Commissioners inform me that some such cases as are referred to in the Question have come under their notice. The Commissioners do not favour the practice because, if it were largely resorted to, untenanted lands might be disposed of by owners to large farmers, and the area available for sale to the Estates Commissioners for the enlargement and improvement of uneconomic holdings and relief of congestion generally would consequently be reduced. The question whether it would be desirable to deal with this matter by legislation will receive the careful consideration of the Government in connection with the forthcoming measure for the Amendment of the Irish Land Laws.

MR. MOORE: Is it worse for a farmer to buy land from a neighbouring farmer than for a neighbouring landlord to sell to a neighbouring farmer?

MR. BIRRELL: But this was not contemplated under the provisions made for advances of public money.

Irish Intermediate Education.

MR. LONSDALE: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether any decision has been arrived at with regard to the suspension of Rule 14 (b) of the Intermediate Education Board for 1909.

MR. BIRRELL: No, Sir; but I hope to be in a position to announce the decision of the Intermediate Education Board in the course of a few days.

Corofin Outrage.

MR. LONSDALE: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he will state the result of the police inquiries into the wounding of John Cahill, of Caherbullane, near Corofin, by gunshots, on 10th October; and whether any persons have been arrested.

MR. BIRRELL: I would refer the hon. Member to the answer which I gave yesterday to a similar Question put by the hon. Member for East Down, to which I have nothing to add.

Louth Cattle Drive.

CAPTAIN CRAIG: I beg to ask the Chief-Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that a cattle-drive took place about 23rd August last off the lands of Johnstown, on the Kearney estate, Louth, when upwards of 200 head of cattle, sheep, and horses were cleared off the farm and all the gates broken down and removed; what arrests have been made; and what sentences passed on the perpetrators of the outrage.

MR. BIRRELL: The police have no information showing that the cattle-drive referred to in the Question took place.

Irish Land Act (1903) Sales.

CAPTAIN CRAIG: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he can state the amount of money at present in the hands of the Estates Commissioners to meet sales under the 1903 Land Act, and the total amount of sales at present in their hands awaiting payment in which title has been proved and in which title has not been proved but agreements have been signed by landlords and tenants.

MR. BIRRELL: This Question appears to be based upon a misapprehension. The Estates Commissioners do not hold in their own hands the funds for making advances, but they draw upon the National Debt Commissioners each week for such sums as are required to meet all cases which are ripe for advances. In the latter part of the Question it seems to be assumed that advances can be made as soon as title has been proved, but this is not the case. The lands have to be inspected and declared to be an estate, and other necessary proceedings have to be taken before an advance can be made. In the case of direct sales from landlords to tenants the amount applied for but not yet advanced is about £41,000,000.

CAPTAIN CRAIG: How much is in the hands of the National Debt Commissioners for this particular purpose?

MR. BIRRELL: The National Debt Commissioners have at present sufficient in their hands to meet the demands made upon them week by week.

CAPTAIN CRAIG: That is to say, they have £41,000,000 ready?

MR. BIRRELL: No.

CAPTAIN CRAIG: Then how much?

MR. BIRRELL: I cannot say.

MR. MOORE: Is there any limit imposed on the Estates Commissioners as to the amount they can draw every week?

MR. BIRRELL: No, Sir.

Derrymore Outrage.

CAPTAIN CRAIG: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that on Wednesday night, 19th August last, about ten o'clock, a daring shooting outrage took place at Derrymore, East Clare, the residence of General E. A. Gore, D.L., when fifteen shots were fired from powerful rifles at his mansion; what arrests have been made; what sentences have been passed on the perpetrators of the outrage; and what reason is assigned by the police for the attack.

MR. BIRRELL: On the occasion in question, thirteen rifle shots were fired in quick succession from a point on the public road commanding a view of General Gore's house at about 800 yards distance. The house does not seem to have been hit. No arrests have been made. It would be contrary to practice to state any suspicions the police may have as to the reasons for the attack.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman very respectfully if it is not a fact that there is not a single tittle of evidence to show that the rifle shots were fired from the road or elsewhere, and that there are no traces whatever to be found of firing?

MR. BIRRELL: I can assure the hon. Member that that is not so.

MR. MOORE: Have the police inquired whether ammunition was purchased from the neighbourhood?

MR. BIRRELL: I have not made such inquiry, but I will do so.

Sheehan's Cross Outrage.

CAPTAIN CRAIG: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that on Tuesday night, 11th August last, a shooting outrage took place near Sheehan's Cross, about eight miles from Kilrush, on the main car line to Ennis, West Clare, when Mr. James Griffin was twice fired at from behind a hedge; what arrests have been made and what sentences have been passed on the perpetrators of the outrage; and what steps have been taken for the future protection of Mr. Griffin.

MR. BIRRELL: I refer to the answers which I gave to Questions on this subject put by the hon. Member for Mid Armagh on 14th and 21st instant. Two shots were fired at Mr. Griffin on the occasion referred to, and he was slightly injured. He returned the fire, but apparently without effect. No arrests have been made. Mr. Griffin is receiving constant police protection.

Bookmakers in Ireland.

MR. SLOAN (Belfast, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if he can state the number of cases tried in Dublin and Belfast during the present year brought against bookmakers for the infringement of the betting laws; and the number of convictions in each place, together with the highest and lowest fines imposed.

MR. BIRRELL: The number of cases tried in Dublin during the present year was thirty; there were twenty-six convictions, and one case is still pending.

The highest and lowest fines were £50 and £2, respectively. In Belfast there were thirty-eight cases and thirty convictions, the highest and lowest fines being £10 and £3, respectively.

Poor Law Officers and Parliamentary Returns.

MR. SLOAN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if, when the Local Government Board sanction payments to Poor Law officers for the preparation of Parliamentary Returns ordered by this House, such remuneration will be paid according to a scale; and will unions who refuse to pay officers or offer insufficient payments be compelled to give adequate remuneration for work done by their officers.

MR. BIRRELL: In determining the amounts which guardians may pay to their officers for the preparation of Parliamentary Returns the Local Government Board take into consideration the particular circumstances of each case. Payment by scale would not be universally equitable, but the Board endeavour to ensure that the remuneration in the several unions shall be settled on a uniform basis. If any case of refusal to give adequate remuneration to officials is brought under their notice, the Board are prepared to address the guardians on the subject.

Irish School Teachers.

MR. SLOAN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if, where a national school teacher has complied with the Education Board's rules and notified his manager of illness, he can say what course he should adopt where the manager refuses to certify for teacher's salary without a reduction, although no rule of the Board was violated.

MR. BIRRELL: I have referred this Question to the Commissioners of National Education, who inform me that they can express no opinion on a hypothetical case. They are prepared to consider any particular case if the facts are submitted to them.

Oatquarter School Teacher.

MR. SLOAN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether, in view of the fact that £2 17s. 6d. was deducted from the salary of the teacher of Oatquarter National School, Roll No. 14,532, for the quarter ending 31st March, 1907, although the notice required by the Board's rules in the case of illness of a teacher was served on the manager of the said school within the time required by Rule 92 (c) and in view of the fact that the teacher was only absent through illness one half-day school, he will order the deduction to be paid to the teacher forthwith.

MR. BIRRELL: This matter is entirely one for the decision of the Commissioners of National Education, who inform me that they have nothing to add to the reply which I gave on their behalf to the hon. Member's Question on the subject on 23rd July last.

MR. SLOAN: Then has the teacher no redress at all when these deductions are made from his salary?

MR. BIRRELL: The deduction was made in this case because the teacher closed the school and the managers declined to certify his claim for payment. I cannot interfere in the matter.

Irish Licensing Laws.

MR. FETHERSTONHAUGH (Fermanagh, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is yet in a position to state if the Irish Government intend to introduce during the next session a Bill for the reform of the Irish licensing laws; if not yet in such a position, can he say at about what period of the present session he will be able to make a definite pronouncement on the subject, as the need for amendment of the law is far more urgent than in England.

THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. CHERRY, Liverpool, Exchange): My right hon. friend the Prime Minister recently informed the hon. and learned Member that the Government cannot make any pledges as to the introduction of licensing legislation for Ireland next session. I regret that I am not at present in a position to add anything to that answer.

Housing Bill.

MR. LANE-FOX: I beg to ask the Prime Minister whether the Government still hope to pass the Housing Bill in this session, in view of the very slow progress made with it in Committee; and whether, under the circumstances, he will save the time of the Members of the Grand Committee by withdrawing the Bill.

THE PRIME MINISTER AND FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. ASQUITH, Fifehire, E.): I see no reason for withdrawing this Bill. My right hon. friend the President of the Local Government Board has every expectation that the Committee stage will not be unduly prolonged, and, under these circumstances, it is our intention to proceed with the Bill.

MR. LANE-FOX: Has the right hon. Gentleman taken into consideration the fact that there are sixty-one clauses and six schedules to this Bill and the Committee are only half-way through the third clause? There has been no sort of obstruction, but only a great deal of oratory.

[No Answer was returned.]

Public Accounts Committee.

LORD R. CECIL: I beg to ask the Prime Minister when he proposes to give a day for the discussion of the Report of the Public Accounts Committee.

MR. ASQUITH: I am afraid I cannot fix a time at present.

*COLONEL R. WILLIAMS (Dorsetshire, W.): I would remind the right hon. Gentleman he was good enough at the end of last session to promise me a day.

Licensing Bill.

MR. FELL: I beg to ask the Prime Minister if he has had any calculation made of the number of persons who have been thrown out of employment by the introduction of the Licensing Bill.

MR. ASQUITH: No, Sir; it is impossible to make any trustworthy calculation.

MR. FELL asked whether the right hon. Gentleman would take into consideration the decrease of work that must follow from the necessary cessation of all building work on licensed premises. Many had been thrown out of employment through the arbitrary action of owners of tied houses.

MR. H. C. LEA (St. Pancras, E.) asked whether it was not the fact that 150,000 men had been thrown out of employment by the introduction of the Licensing Bill.

MR. ASQUITH: That is a perfectly ridiculous statement.

MR. BRIGHT (Oldham): I beg to ask the Prime Minister whether he will be willing, on the report of the Licensing Bill, to insert words providing that in the local options which are to be enacted by Parliament on the termination of the reduction period other methods of public control than limiting or reducing the number of licences shall be included.

MR. ASQUITH was understood to reply in the affirmative, adding that if a provision of this kind were made it was desirable that every possible option should be given.

MR. S. COLLINS (Lambeth, Kennington): How?

SELECTION (STANDING COMMITTEES).

Sir WILLIAM BRAMPTON GURDON reported from the Committee of Selection; That they had discharged the following Members from Standing Committee C. (in respect of the Coal Mines (Eight Hours) (No. 2) Bill): Mr. Long and Mr. Myer; and had appointed in substitution (in respect of the said Bill): Captain Clive and Dr. Pollard.

Report to lie upon the Table.

LICENSING BILL.

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 9 :

*MR. CAVE (Surrey, Kingston) said that in moving the omission of subsection (1) he wished to find out exactly what the clause meant. There was some doubt both as to the wording of the clause and as to the application of previous declarations of the Government in the matter. In the first place, the clause proceeded at present by licensing districts. They all knew that in an earlier clause a change was made from licensing districts to parishes and urban areas, and he thought it would be of interest to know whether a similar alteration of policy would be made in this case. In the second place, he wanted to call attention to this: the clause provided that if a resolution for further reduction was passed, then the reduction was to be made, but the clause omitted to say by whom that resolution was to be passed. There was nothing in the whole of the clause to show whether it should be a resolution of electors, or of justices, or of somebody else. So far as the clause itself went, it might be a resolution passed at a public meeting called by the United Kingdom Alliance. He dared say he would be told that the intention was that there should be a similar resolution to that in Clause 2; but if that was so, the clause wanted a great deal of alteration, and here again some of that re-drafting already promised ought to be made as soon as possible. It was impossible to construe the clause as drawn in that way, and they would certainly expect, what they were now accustomed to, a recasting of the clause. In the next place if a resolution of parochial electors was intended, was the resolution to be passed by a bare majority, as in Clause 2, or by a majority of three-fifths, as in the Scottish Local Option Bill, or of two-thirds, as in the amended Clause 3 of the Bill? According to the policy of the Government hitherto, immediate local veto was to be obtained by a bare majority and local veto fourteen years hence by a two-thirds majority. On which of these principles was this clause to be framed? It was a vital matter to everybody concerned. Then, again, were off-licences to be included? Under Clause 2 of the Bill they were certainly included, and under Clause 3 as amended he thought they were included, but they were told that that was a slip on the part of the Government. Were they to be added by the Government to the present clause? If all this happened, the effect of the clause was this, that if a resolution was passed, then immediately, as he gathered, there was to be made in the parish or area in question either a reduction of licences by 50 per cent. more than the statutory reduction, or a reduction by 200 per cent. more than the statutory reduction, or the immediate absolute extinction of all on-licences of any kind. In other words, this was something quite different from what they were discussing the other day, viz., a nebulous prohibition fourteen years hence. It was, or might be, the immediate prohibition of all the licences in a district. Then, as he understood the clause—and the learned Solicitor-General did not stop him, so he presumed his reading was correct—no licensee was to have the right of appeal. Supposing a resolution for partial reduction was passed, the houses chosen were to have no right of appeal; they were to be immolated, and they were to have no opportunity of going to a higher authority. If extinguished during the reduction period, they would be entitled to compensation, but if extinguished after the reduction period, they took no compensation at all. He thought he was right in his reading. If so, they were placed in a very serious position indeed. They had a proposal involving the possibility of immediate prohibition. They had had one discussion on the matter, and he was not now going through all the arguments against local veto, but he wanted shortly to indicate why he would give his strong and unalterable opposition to any proposal of that kind. In the first place, let them look at the tyranny of the thing. Whatever the majority might be in any particular parish or area, there would always be a mass of individuals, perhaps in a minority, who did desire to consume alcohol in a licensed house. Nobody contended that it was immoral, and the doctors said it was desirable. At all events they had a mass of people who preferred to take their drink in that way. He referred the Committee to what was said some years ago by a Liberal statesman on this matter. Speaking on a Licensing Bill Sir William Harcourt said :—

“ Liberty does not consist in making others do what you think right. The difference between a free Government and a Government which is not free is principally this : that a Government which is not free interferes with everything it can, and a free Government interferes with nothing except what it must. A despotic Government tries to make every body do what it wishes. It is this practice of allowing one set of people to dictate to another set of people what they shall do, what they shall think, what they shall drink, when they shall go to bed, what they shall buy and where they shall buy it, what wages they shall get and how they shall spend them, against which the Liberal Party have always protested.”

That speech was made by Sir William Harcourt in 1872, and he did not think that statesman altered his views. Later on Sir William Harcourt said—

“ The policy of the Liberal Party has been for generations a policy of emancipation from restriction, and if it is now to set to work to forge fresh fetters for the free, I myself will have no part in such a perversion. I am against the whole system of petty molestation and irritating dictation, whether by a class or by the majority. I do not admire the grand-maternal Government which ties night-caps on a grown-up nation by Act of Parliament.”

So much for the tyranny of this proposal. He would next deal with the point that where they had restrictions without strong public feeling behind them they always got evasions. It was impossible for anybody who had studied the facts to doubt that if they were going to enforce prohibition upon an unwilling minority they would not get the law obeyed, and instead of doing good they would do harm. He always accepted with a good deal of hesitation figures given them from private sources as to the operation of local veto in other places, because a good deal depended upon the quarter from which they came. He was not satisfied with the figures either for or against prohibition from private sources, but he relied on the official figures, and those who had studied them must be convinced that the mere reduction of licences did not produce increased sobriety or a decrease of drunkenness. If they merely suppressed on-licences, leaving untouched the other sources of supply, they were taking a step which to him seemed childish.

Mr. Cave.

Licences were granted on the hypothesis that they were required, and if they suppressed something which was granted to meet a demand, if they prevented men from buying in the open shop, they would certainly buy at the off-licensed house or supply themselves from another source. Therefore the prohibition or suppression of one particular mode of sale was bound to be ineffective. If they were going to suppress all sources of supply as some hon. Members wished, then they would simply drive the evil in, and they would get the same results as had been found in other places where that particular method had been tried. He wondered whether hon. Members had read an account given by the hon. Member for Woodstock of the result of his visit to the State of Maine in the United States. It illustrated well what happened everywhere when they attempted to suppress by law something which public opinion did not commend. The hon. Member wrote—

“ The enforcement of the prohibition law is, as I have already said, carried out at present in Portland with a thoroughness and severity hitherto unknown. Raids, arrests, and fines are the crambe repetita of the Police Court annals ; no open saloon exists, the Liquor Agency is altogether above suspicion, and no hotel will under any pretext furnish the visitor with any form of intoxicant. Nevertheless, what do we find ? A few weeks ago I visited Portland, and after dinner at my hotel, took a walk with a friend through the town. At 8.30 a successful police raid was directed against the Atwood Cafe in Center Street. Fifty dozen bottles of Budweiser beer, and several dozens of ‘ Bass ’ were captured and removed in patrol wagons. About ten o’clock I asked a young man who appeared to be in charge at the restaurant if I could get a glass of beer and he said that he would have been delighted to accommodate me, but every bottle of beer had been removed in the raid. This young person appeared to be quite cheerful ; he seemed to regard his losses as the fortune of war, and the restaurant had probably realized considerable profits on the previous sale. Leaving this optimist we soon afterward reached the doorway which somehow suggested alcohol. I entered, and on passing through an inner door found myself in an ordinary bar with the familiar white handles ranged along its inner side. Placing five cents on the counter I was promptly served with a glass of beer. Half a dozen other men were drinking, and while I was inside breaking the law in order to gain information, a powerfully built man who stood at the end of the room handed over flasks of whisky to several disreputable looking individuals who entered the bar quickly and as quickly disappeared. These men are known as ‘ pocket-pedlars ’ and sell spirits at most of it fiery and maddening stuff—at exorbitant prices to customers whom they chance to meet.”

The article went on to deal with other matters which were well worth reading, and it concluded with this statement—

"The net result is that during the week I was there no fewer than fifty-eight arrests for intoxication took place, and the average for the year actually amounts to between forty and fifty per week, which in a population of 60,000 works out for Portland to about forty per thousand inhabitants per annum—that is three times as bad as our worst drinking centres, the seaport towns and mining counties, six times as bad as London, and nine times as bad as our manufacturing towns."

*MR. LEIF JONES (Westmoreland, Appleby): Was that in a prohibition State or a no-licence district in a local option State?

*MR. CAVE said it was in Maine, and it was in a town which was in the same position as this clause would reduce Wales and Monmouth to. The article proceeded—

"Such statistics cannot, it is true, be cited as absolutely conclusive evidence in these cases, for they do not cover all the ground, but after all they form practically all the available data we possess for comparisons between one town and another, and they certainly lend support to the view of practically every ordinary level-headed citizen one meets, that the prohibition law is in many respects a hypocritical farce as far as the larger towns are concerned."

So much for the certainty of evasion in the case of passing a measure of this kind. The other objections to local veto were well known. It would lead to frequent polls and canvassing of a most objectionable kind. It would give to the publican a precarious tenure, which always led to the bad conduct of public-houses, and in the end would lead to a great increase in the very kind of drinking which they desired to put an end to. It also meant a grievous loss to the men whose houses were suppressed whether they were brewers or private owners or licensees. Under this Bill the passing of a resolution in Wales would mean ruin to a number of people, because the compensation to be paid under this measure was nothing like the market value. For the reasons he had put forward and for other reasons he would always be opposed to a measure of prohibition. Several hon. Members opposite had told them plainly that they were opposed to prohibition and to local veto. Some of them had refrained from voting either against or in favour of the local veto proposals in Clause 3, because it was understood that those provisions would not take effect without the passing of a further Act of Parliament. That excuse, however, was of no avail upon this clause, which meant immediate local veto in Wales. He claimed that hon. Members opposite who were opposed to local veto ought to vote on this clause in accordance with their opinions. He was glad to see in his place the hon. Member for Huddersfield who made so earnest and interesting a speech the other night on this point. The hon. Member not only opposed local veto, but he gave reasons for his opposition. He should be glad to know what line the hon. Member intended to take on this Amendment, and whether he intended to support the Government or not. The same observation applied to other hon. Members who were present. He was moving this Amendment not on the footing of opposition to the whole Bill, although he was opposed to it. He hoped to have the support in the division lobby of all those who were opposed to local veto. The Westminster Gazette had an article recently in which the writer pointed out that by adopting local veto the Government were departing from the main lines of the Bill, and advised the Government not to press the point. He was entitled to say that this clause was entirely separable from the rest of the Bill, and he hoped they would have the real opinion of the House reflected in the division on this clause. He knew that anybody who took upon himself to oppose any part of this Bill, took a certain amount of responsibility on his shoulders. They had their own views as to what were the proper remedies for the evils which they all admitted existed. When he listened to the hon. Member for Huddersfield the other night, he found himself entirely in agreement with the final part of his speech, in which he said that the real remedy was not to be found in attacking public-houses, but in improving the conditions under which alcohol was sold. They would find in the Blue-book for 1907 figures which showed that drunkenness was the greatest where there was the greatest density of population.

*THE CHAIRMAN: Really the hon. Gentleman is now going a little too wide of the Amendment. The general question of the right remedy for the prevalence of drunkenness hardly arises on this Amendment.

*MR. CAVE said he bowed to the ruling. He would content himself with what he had said as indicating that those who opposed this clause were not without their views and convictions as to what was the real remedy for the evils of drunkenness.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 5, line 28, to leave out subsection (1)."—(Mr. Cave.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'If at any time after the' stand part of the clause."

THE SOLICITOR-GENERAL (Sir S. EVANS, Glamorganshire, Mid.) said he did not address the Committee as a Welsh Member, but in his capacity as a minor member of the Government. The hon. Member said the excision of the clause would not destroy the Bill. That was so, but the Government thought its omission would be very injurious to the Principality and to the county of Monmouth. His hon. friend behind him who had a sort of hereditary right to speak on this matter would reply further on the general question. Taking the four questions put by the hon. Member, his first question was—What was the area in which the operation of this clause would take place? As the Committee had decided that the area was to be the rural area or urban area as defined in the Bill that would also be the area in which the operation of this clause would take place. He need hardly say that an Amendment to that effect had been put down. The second question was—Who was to pass the resolution? There was on the Paper a mere drafting Amendment in his name which when made would make it obvious that the people who were to pass the resolution were the parochial electors. The next question was—What was the proportion with regard to the local veto and then with regard to the other provisions relating to further reductions? The answer was that the Committee had already decided that where local veto was concerned the resolution had to be carried by two-thirds majority. When they were dealing with further reductions the reduction was to be carried by a bare majority. The next question was—Were off-licences to be included? In the time-limit clause off-licences were included in Clause 3 by the Amendment moved by the First Commissioner of Works. That would be the provision also with regard to off-licences in this clause, but when they came to the question of local option in another part of the Bill off-licences were not to be included for the purpose of the time-limit. They were included for monopoly value under Clause 3.

MR. CAVE: The hon. and learned Gentleman did not say whether there was any appeal.

SIR S. EVANS: Under the further reduction?

MR. CAVE: Yes.

SIR S. EVANS: No there is to be no appeal.

MR. AKERS-DOUGLAS (Kent, St. Augustine's) said the Solicitor General had answered the questions put to him by his hon. and learned friend the Member for Kingston, but he had not offered any defence of the clause. By this clause the Government were according different treatment to Wales from that given to England. This clause was not discussed on the Second Reading of the Bill, and therefore they had not heard what particular defence the Government had to make for treating Wales in this way. He rose to make this protest because he saw a bevy of Welsh Members in the House belonging to the Radical Party who would, no doubt, later in the debate give their reasons why they thought Wales should be treated differently from England. This clause applied only to Wales and the county of Monmouth; it contained a very serious proposal, and he thought the Committee ought to have had from the Government some particular defence of it. He did not think that the answers to questions which had just been given by the Solicitor-General, except possibly as far as off-licences were concerned, in any way lessened the objection. He and his friends had to the As he read the clause a have no right of appeal at that form of relief is given. The amount of the relief in any particular case should be determined by the necessities of that case. Although in some instances the conditions might be such that the proposed relief would be needed, in others this would not be so, and in the latter cases the additional relief could not properly be given. I have informed the guardians accordingly.

Consumptive Sanatoria.

MR. HIGHAM (Yorkshire, W.R., Sowerby): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board if he will issue a circular to local authorities, especially boroughs, pointing out the wisdom of contributing to the upkeep of consumption sanatoria, either by annual contribution or by a sum per capita, according to the number of sufferers from tuberculosis the authority may send to the sanatorium for treatment.

MR. JOHN BURNS: I propose to issue an Order to provide for the notification to medical officers of health of pauper cases of pulmonary tuberculosis, and I also propose, when sending copies of the Order to the sanitary authorities, to draw their attention to the administrative action which can be taken in connection with such matters as that referred to in the Question. This will, I hope meet the object which my hon. friend has in view.

The Motor Car Act, 1903.

MR. CATHCART WASON (Orkney and Shetland): I beg to ask the Prime Minister if he is aware of the feeling of dissatisfaction that prevails in the country owing to the action of a section of the community habitually and determinedly disregarding the speed-limit imposed by the Motor Car Act, 1903, and especially the abuse and offensive terms applied to police and magistrates for trying to enforce the said limitation; and if, in view of the necessity of the matter and also the difficulties connected with legislation, he would appoint a Committee of the House, representing impartially the different views held on the subject, to suggest legislation that might be passed by consent,

MR. JOHN BURNS: The Prime Minister has asked me to reply to this Question. I am aware of the feeling on the subject to which it relates. I am afraid that my hon. friend is too sanguine in thinking that the various interests concerned would agree to legislative proposals in connection with this matter, and hence it does not seem to me that there would be likely to be advantage in the appointment of a Committee as suggested. My hon. friend is perhaps aware that I have recently issued a circular to local authorities drawing attention to the existing law and pressing upon them the importance of its enforcement. I am also in consultation with my right hon. friend the Home Secretary with regard to the feasibility of further action.

MR. MARKHAM (Nottinghamshire, Mansfield): Is the right hon. Gentleman not aware that the regulations issued by his Department are habitually and daily broken in every street in London?

MR. JOHN BURNS: If that be so, the responsibility rests with the local authority. The London County Council would be doing its duty by making representations to me on this matter, when the Home Secretary and I would do all we could to act most promptly and effectually in limiting speed or doing anything reasonable to protect life and property.

MR. MARKHAM: The County Council has nothing whatever to do with these Regulations; they are in the hands of the Home Secretary.

MR. JOHN BURNS: In that case I urge my hon. friend to address the Question to the Home Secretary.

MR. MARKHAM: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that whenever a Question is addressed to the Home Secretary he refers me to the President of the Local Government Board?

MR. JOHN BURNS: On behalf of myself and my right hon. friend I shall be pleased to answer any Question of which notice has been given. We have no desire to evade criticism or to burke discussion.

Precautions against Influenza.

SIR PHILIP MAGNUS (London University): To ask the Prime Minister whether, in view of the possible recurrence of the influenza epidemic during the approaching winter months, he will reconsider the question of the adjournment of the House for a half-hour, between the hours of seven and nine, in order that the windows may be opened for the admission of fresh air and the better ventilation of the Chamber.

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (Mr. L. HARCOURT, Lancashire, Rossendale): Without expressing any opinion as to the advisability of the suggestion in connection with the possibility of a recurrence of the influenza epidemic, I would point out that, as explained on many previous occasions, the system of mechanical ventilation does not lend itself to the opening of windows. A much better result can be obtained by running the appliances at full speed during an adjournment; but even this requires to be very judiciously done in the winter season, otherwise it might be difficult to "catch-up" the lowered temperature which would necessarily result in severe weather. The matter of an adjournment or a recurrence to the old informal break in the sitting is one which the Prime Minister could only consider if he was convinced that it represented a great weight of opinion in all quarters of the House.

MR. PIRIE (Aberdeen, N.) asked the right hon. Gentleman whether he had read the pamphlet by the hon. Member for North Bucks, in which it was stated that though the ventilation might be the best in the world the result of it was the worst known, and whether he would take steps to pay attention to this matter.

MR. L. HARCOURT: I have perused the pamphlet, but I have not arrived at the same conclusion.

SIR PHILIP MAGNUS suggested the consideration of an alteration in the present mechanical system of ventilation in order, if possible, to open the windows.

Hop Cultivation.

MR. COURTHOPE: I beg to ask the hon. Member for South Somerset, as representing the President of the Board of Agriculture, how many acres of hops have been cultivated this year and in 1907 in Great Britain; and whether so great a decrease in acreage has been recorded in any previous year.

THE PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. J. A. PEASE, Essex, Saffron Walden, for Sir EDWARD STRACHEY): The acreage under hops this year was 38,921 acres, as compared with 44,938 acres in 1907, a decrease of 6,019 acres. The decrease in 1887 as compared with 1886 was as much as 6,421 acres.

Unpicked Hops.

MR. COURTHOPE: I beg to ask the hon. Member for South Somerset, as representing the President of the Board of Agriculture, how many acres of hops have this year been left unpicked owing to the disastrous state of the hop market.

MR. J. A. PEASE (for Sir EDWARD STRACHEY): It is estimated that some 3,500 acres of hops have from one cause or another been left unpicked this year.

Wallsend Small Holdings Society.

MR. GEORGE ROBERTS (Norwich): I beg to ask the hon. Member for South Somerset, as representing the President of the Board of Agriculture, whether his attention has been drawn to an application made by the Wallsend Small Holdings Society, Limited, to the Northumberland County Council for 212 acres of land; and whether he can state what steps are being taken to provide the land thus applied for.

MR. J. A. PEASE: The Board have been in communication with the Northumberland County Council on this subject, and they are informed that the Council have instructed their land agent to ascertain whether any suitable land is available for satisfying the requirements of the society.

Small Holdings in Kent.

MR. GEORGE ROBERTS: I beg to ask the hon. Member for South Somerset, as representing the President of the Board of Agriculture, whether he can state if the Board or the Kent County Council has succeeded in providing a small holding for David Nicholls, against whom an eviction warrant was made by a bench of magistrates sitting at Tonbridge, on 20th July last, upon the application of Nicholls' landlord, the reason alleged being that Nicholls had applied for land under the Small Holdings Act.

MR. J. A. PEASE: It has not, I am sorry to say, been found possible as yet to provide a small holding for Mr. Nicholls, but the acquisition of a farm for the purpose of providing small holdings is under the consideration of the county council, and this would enable them to comply with his application.

MR. MORRELL (Oxfordshire, Henley) asked if there was anything to prevent the Board of Agriculture taking action in this case?

MR. J. A. PEASE said he did not think they should interfere until, at any rate, there had been an opportunity of acquiring the farm.

Small Holdings in England and Wales.

MR. R. HARCOURT (Montrose Burghs): I beg to ask the hon. Member for South Somerset, as representing the President of the Board of Agriculture, if he will now state the acreage of land acquired under the Small Holdings Act by each county in England and Wales separately.

MR. J. A. PEASE: The following table gives the information for which my hon. friend asks—views as a whole, and had spoken in the same voice on this all-important subject. In 1891 a Local Veto Bill for Wales was passed under a Conservative Administration in a Conservative House of Commons by a majority, and the Second Reading of a similar measure was passed in 1893, giving to the people of Wales effective control over the liquor traffic. The next point he would mention was the recommendation of Lord Peel's Commission and the Chairman's recommendation on this subject. That Report was issued in 1898, and the recommendation of Lord Peel's Report was that in seven years Wales should be given a large measure of popular control. But further than that they had had for Wales special legislation in the sphere of licensing. The right hon. Gentleman who had just sat down objected to the fact that if this clause were passed Wales would have special treatment in regard to the reduction and the prohibition of licences. But they had already in Wales legislation in the sphere of licensing. They had the Welsh Sunday Closing Act. That was, he ventured to say, the foundation upon which they built their case for special treatment. One or two facts would show the general character and the strength of the forces behind the movement which operated in Welsh public life in support of this clause. Every county council in Wales had passed a resolution in favour of the principle of this clause, and also a great many borough councils, boards of guardians, and public bodies. He only mentioned this in order to show that the support of this principle permeated all through the public life of the country. It was not something that was manufactured at election times and by politicians, but it was something that went to the root of the life of the people. The last force he would like to refer to in support of this principle—and it was undoubtedly the greatest of all—was the long continued support given to the principle by the great Nonconformist denominations in the Principality. What had the Welsh temperance reformers done on this point? They first had asked for the right of controlling, by the voice of the people in each locality, the number of licences. That would in a large measure be granted to them through the operations of this clause. The claim which the people of Wales made for larger powers in connection with the reduction of licences was not based upon anything in their minds as to the special evil and injurious effects of the drink traffic in Wales. The demand was based upon what had long been the conviction of the great majority, namely, that if they could reduce the facilities for drink there would be an effective step taken in the direction of sobriety. The right hon. Gentleman who had just sat down had referred to the difficulty of treating Wales differently from England in this matter. Might he remind the Committee of a notable declaration made on this point during the Second Reading of the Welsh Sunday Closing Bill in 1881 by the late Mr. Gladstone? Mr Gladstone said—

“Wales is after all a country with a people of its own, with a language of its own, with traditions of its own, and with religious feelings and associations of its own. This I will say, that where there is a distinctly formed Welsh opinion upon a given subject, and the acceptance of which does not entail any public danger or public inconvenience to the rest of the Empire, I know of no reason why a respectful regard should not be paid to that opinion.”

If it was right according to Mr. Gladstone in 1881 to pay a respectful regard to the feeling of the people of Wales on Sunday closing and to give Wales special treatment on the matter, there was no valid reason why he should not ask the House of Commons to have the same regard paid to it in regard to local option. Temperance reformers in Wales had always had their eyes fixed on the same goal and had tried to march forward on the same line. He would point out that in the Local Veto Bills of 1891 and 1893 there were two options—the option of reduction and the option of prohibition. They in Wales had long been convinced, whilst they recognised and believed that their goal in time should be for prohibition, that there must be large areas of the country where it was impossible, in existing circumstances, effectively to secure prohibition. So that from first to last they had asked for the two options, and those two options they asked to-day. He would point out to the Committee what would be the practical result of the carrying out of this clause. Supposing the people of Wales were to utilise its provisions to the fullest extent. The number of licences in Wales and

Sir Herbert Roberts,

Monmouthshire, according to the latest returns, was 7,100. Were these licences reduced to the statutory limit they would stand at 4,659; and if the further resolution was passed, subject, of course, to financial conditions, they would be further reduced by 3,104. There were one or two comments he would make upon those figures. The Solicitor-General had already referred to the question of area. Although he had his own view upon that point, he recognised that having regard to the Amendments which had been made in the Bill on an earlier clause, it was necessary to alter the area in the provision to meet the alterations already made. But the only practical difference between the working of this clause with regard to further reductions in Wales, and the second reductions in the working of the clause as generally applicable to the whole country, was that whereas in England the second reductions, the optional reductions, would take place according to the discretion of the justices, in Wales they would take place subject to the voice of the people in the locality. There was no distinction in principle; the only difference was that having regard to the strong feeling in Wales, it would enable the people to decide that question, whereas in England it was left to the justices. His last point was the long time that Wales had asked for the adoption of popular control of licences. He felt certain that all Members on that side, and many Members on the other side of the House, would be ready to consider the case of Wales as resting upon different conditions from the general case of the whole country. He reminded the Committee that this had long been a burning question in the Principality. It had been the hope of the people for generations, and they were speaking about things that they knew—about the conditions of life and the opinions of the people amongst whom they had to live all their lives. It would be useless for him to attempt to minimise the strength of the conviction prevailing in Wales on this point, and he appealed to the hon. Gentleman to give this clause a careful consideration. They asked for an experiment to be tried within the limits of Wales, which they believed would be of undoubted benefit to the Welsh people. They believed that if they obtained this larger power it would be an instrument in their hands for doing better things, and endeavouring to work out their salvation in these matters in accordance with the deep-rooted convictions of their country. He had in conclusion only to thank the Committee for the very kind hearing they had given him. He spoke somewhat strongly on this point because he felt strongly, and he hoped the result of this debate would be that the clause would be passed by a decisive majority.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR (City of London) said he could assure the hon. Member who had just sat down that he would be the last person to complain of his speech. He wished, however, the Government would do something to meet the appeal of his right hon. friend near him, the Member for the St. Augustine's division of Kent, who surely put forward a reasonable request that they should have a general discussion on this clause before going into the details. If this clause had been discussed on the Second Reading, it might be reasonable to wait for the question that the clause stand part of the Bill, before they discussed it generally. But it was not discussed on the Second Reading, and he was not aware that a single syllable was said either in condemnation or in praise of it by speakers then present. It therefore really behoved the Government to make some general statement to the House and the country as to why Wales should receive particular treatment, and why, if it received particular treatment, it should be of the especial character designed by this clause. He did not know whether the members of the Government who were not subordinate members of the Government—he was alluding to a distinction drawn by the learned Solicitor-General—he did not know whether members of the Government who were not subordinate, were going to defer any discussion until they got to the question that the clause stand part of the Bill. That was a course which might have justification if they were not working under the particular rules of the closure, but there was absolutely no justification for it when they were working under those rules. He would not labour the point, because he understood from signs from the Treasury Bench that they agreed to the proposal that he had made, and that they would give them their views of this clause before they proceeded to the details. In order that they might be able to give that defence under the best possible circumstances it might be convenient that he should ask them one or two questions with regard to this proposal. In the first place, did they agree with the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down that there was no difference of principle between this clause and the clause dealing with the optional reduction of licences in England? He listened to that statement with amazement, especially in the mouth of the hon. Gentleman. Was it the view of the Government generally that there was no difference in principle, in leaving it to the magistrates to initiate any decrease in the number of licences to be dealt with and the plan by which that initiative, indeed that decision, was left to the popular vote? Was that accepted by the Government? Was this merely the English principle with slight modifications and in a new disguise? He objected to the English method of doing it, and he certainly did not think that the Government had thought that in getting hold of this decision and taking it away from the magistrates, and giving it to the voters in the various parishes, they were doing nothing that touched principle but that they were merely occupied with details. That was the first question which he would ask, because he understood that the hon. Gentleman who had just spoken, spoke in some sense on behalf of his brother Members from Wales. The next question was whether the Government thought that Wales ought to have a diminution of licences by popular vote, because Wales was peculiarly qualified to deal with these questions by way of popular vote, and that England had not risen to those heights of self-government, which the Government thought might be managed without abuse by Wales, but which the poor Englishmen living on this side of the Welsh border ought not to have entrusted to them, without a long preliminary training, lasting for fourteen or twenty years. He would put the same question in a different form. Did the Government think that this plan was unsuited to England, or did they think that though it was suited for England, England was not fitted for it? Which of these two alternatives did they mean to adopt? They had deliberately taken a plan for Wales and deliberately rejected it for England. They had both plans before them and they had put them in their Bill and they differed. He wished to know how that difference in the Bill was justified. Was it that England was not fitted for it, or that it was not suitable for her condition?

MR. WILLIAM JONES (Carmarthen-shire, Arfon): England is not ready for it.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said then we were apparently in an undeveloped and semi-civilised condition, which justified the Government in withholding full local management for many years, just as they withheld self-government from a Crown Colony which had not reached the stage of social development in which they thought free institutions could be granted. Unfortunately he was addressing at that moment an assemblage chiefly composed of Welshmen, and therefore the particular point of his argument would not appeal to them as he thought it would appeal if he addressed it to Englishmen. He understood from the declaration just made and from the framework of the Bill and from the interruptions he had received from hon. Gentlemen that they thought this treatment ought to be given to Wales and not to England. [A WELSH MEMBER: "Oh, we are prepared to give it you."]

MR. WILLIAM JONES: We are prepared to give you anything.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said then perhaps the answer was that Wales had really asked for this and England did not want it.

MR. WILLIAM JONES: England does not ask Parliament for it.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said that England would ask for it if she wanted it. He had put the question and had received contradictory answers from above and below the gangway, and when a member of the Government rose and spoke, he hoped he would solve his doubts upon this subject. The Government had deliberately adopted the popular method of dealing with licences in Wales, and they had deliberately adopted the magisterial method in England. Was it that the Welsh people were better than the English, or that the English people were better than the Welsh, or was it because Wales wanted it and England did not. Those were the alternatives, and he should like the Government to give a reply as to each of them. At all events they ought to be informed on which of these strange alternatives the Government were going to stand or fall. There was another point. There was no limit to the number of licences which must be compulsorily reduced by a bare majority, except the amount of money available to pay what the Government were pleased to describe as compensation for the destruction of the licensee's interest in his holding. What he wanted to know was, whether the money from which this so-called compensation was to come was not drawn out of the common stock to which England and Wales contributed in the same proportion and on the same basis. He thought he was right in saying that that was so. If it was so, it meant not only that the Welsh people might be trusted while the English people might not be, but that the Welsh people might be trusted with English money which the English people themselves were not allowed to touch. Was that in any way a misrepresentation? Was not that exactly what it meant? How on earth were the Government going to justify that? According to the theory of hon. Gentleman opposite there ought to be, or might be, a great need for reduction of licences beyond the statutory scheme laid down in the schedule of the Bill. The only limit proposed was a financial limit, and the machinery by which the common fund was to be drawn from was in the case of Wales a popular machinery, while in the case of England it was a magisterial machinery. So far as he could gauge the matter the Government believed that they were much more likely to have reckless action taken by the popular than by the magisterial method. In other words, there would be more reductions by popular than by magisterial method. Then why should this procedure be carried out only in one country and at the expense of the other? Why was this financial preference to be given to the Principality? Why was it to be allowed to draw upon the general resources of the nation when carrying out its own views by a popular majority? He now came to the third question. The Government had said that it had always been their intention to see that local veto, speaking generally, should not be applied by a bare majority, but by a two-thirds majority. They did not think, if they were in the minority, that it would be fair to allow a bare majority to deprive them of alcoholic liquor. When they were giving those extended powers why did they not go in for a two-thirds and not a bare majority system? There was nothing that he was aware of, supposing English money held out long enough, why a large number of districts in Wales should not have every single licence withdrawn. If there was enough English money to do the job, the Welsh parish councils in various parts of the Principality might be able to have total prohibition in their districts. If they were to enforce total prohibition—and it could only be fairly and justly given on a two-thirds majority—after fourteen years trading, why were they going to give it in another place—Wales—under a system of a bare majority? He hoped the Government would explain this portion of the Bill in its relation to the other portions. It was a right hon. friend of his who said that this Bill was managed by the Government in water-tight compartments—first by one Minister and then by another. His right hon. friend might have added that it was fought out in water-tight compartments, and that a particular scheme was advanced by one Minister for one section of the Bill, and that scheme had no fault except that it was totally inconsistent with another scheme advanced by another Minister. Let them have this Welsh part of the Bill defended in relation to the whole scheme of the Government in respect to the licensing question, and let the Government clearly show why they adopted one set of principles across the Welsh border and another for the English side of the border. The hon. Gentleman who had just sat down told the Committee that Wales had a particular claim to special treatment, because it had been consistent in its views on this subject through many elections. He did not quarrel with the hon. Gentleman for his opinion of his countrymen. The hon. Gentleman had a better opportunity than himself of forming an opinion, but when a Member was elected for a given constituency how could they say he would not have been elected except for the fact that his constituency wanted this or that thing done for which the hon. Member intended to vote? The hon. Member would not deny that the great majority of the Welsh Members had been consistent in desiring disestablishment.

SIR HERBERT ROBERTS: It has been the dominant question with them for years.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: But they could not have more than one dominant question at one time, and if the local veto question was the dominant question at the time of the election, where did disestablishment and the free trade question stand? They were painfully familiar with the fact that there was a Welsh majority on the free trade question. That was a fact which had had a very important consequence on the balance of Parties in this House and on national legislation and policy, but he did not think they could say when a particular question came up with regard to Wales, that that was a dominant question in Wales, and that the representatives of all other portions of the kingdom should be asked to give a particular majority of Welsh Members that which they said they ought to have. He had a great distrust of that kind of thing. Every Government had to consider—ought to consider, and was bound to consider—the opinions of the majority of the representatives of the people in this House, but that did not mean that they were to break up their legislation into small pieces, cut it up into fragments until the whole formed no more organic unit than a tessellated pavement of ill-cemented fragments. There was only one other question of importance on which he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would really give them information at length. The hon. Member who had just sat down had told them there had been special legislation for Wales in the past—Sunday closing, for instance. He used that as a reason for giving more special legislation; but could the Government give the Committee facts and figures to show that special legislation for Wales had had its natural and appropriate result in increased temperance? Naturally he had not the same opportunities which the Government possessed for arriving at any conclusion on this point: but such figures as had been given to him apparently showed the lamentable fact that intemperance in Wales had increased and not diminished since the special temperance legislation was passed, and that at this moment intemperance in Wales compared very unfavourably with intemperance in this country. But the Government must have figures, and they must have surveyed the situation before introducing this anomaly into their Bill. They must have approached the subject from the point of view of the social reformer, who did not really consider platform cries, but the lessons of experience and the actual working of such legislative experiments as had been tried already. He hoped, therefore, that the House would not be put off on this branch of the question by the Government's attempting to show whether Wales was less or more temperate than it used to be through a comparison with the adjoining counties in England. He agreed that if people desired to have a change in the law it was a reason for considering their wishes; but there was another branch of the argument which no wise legislator could afford to put on one side. It was the effect that any particular reform would have on the social well-being of the country. He did not suppose that Wales had a greater dose of original sin than its neighbours on the English side of the border; but it had enjoyed special temperance legislation, and if it was found that the population which had this special legislation was less temperate than a population not hitherto so blessed, there was but one conclusion—namely, that special legislation as a remedy for intemperance ought to be received with extreme caution. He did not put it higher than that. He was not one of those who thought that the complicated problems touched upon in this drink question could be settled by a formula here and there; but was there any one in the House who did not feel, when he was studying this most difficult and complex of all problems, that one thing must give pause to the hasty and enthusiastic legislator, viz., that the hasty and enthusiastic legislation passed had not only not been followed by any of those happy consequences which its promoters always desired, but that, as far as could prove anything, they seemed to show that coincident with that special legislation there had been a perceptible increase of the very vice and evil which that special legislation was intended to cure.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Mr. McKENNA, Monmouthshire, N.) said that the right hon. Gentleman had very fairly asked the Government to give some general defence of this clause in its relation to Wales. If the right hon. Gentleman was right in his view that Wales, having had exceptional legislative treatment for some years, so far from becoming more sober had become less sober, then he would agree that the right hon. Gentleman had put forward a very formidable argument against any fresh experiment in Welsh legislation. But it so happened that the question the right hon. Gentleman had put as to whether Wales had become less temperate under this special legislation had been answered by two Royal Commissions which had considered this subject. Both Commissions were appointed by the Government of which the right hon. Gentleman was a leading Member. The first Commission, presided over by Lord Balfour of Burleigh, inquired into the operation of the Welsh Sunday Closing Act. After it had been seven years in force, the Commission found unanimously, on full investigation of the facts, that the measure had been a success, and recommended its continuance. That Commission was appointed by the right hon. Gentleman's own Government, whose supporters were opposed to Welsh Sunday Closing; and if that Commission had been able to report that the Act had worked unfavourably in Wales, that recommendation would have been gladly accepted by the right hon. Gentleman's Government. But the Commission who investigated the facts fully and fairly, came to the opposite conclusion, namely, that the Welsh Sunday Closing Act was found to have justified itself. Then another Royal Commission was appointed by the right hon. Gentleman's Government, but Welsh Sunday closing was only a minor question in the reference. It was Lord Peel's Commission, and this was the conclusion at which they arrived after the Sunday Closing Act in Wales had been in operation for twenty years.

"We repeat that in Wales, as a whole, Sunday closing has been a success, and if, in some places, as in Cardiff, success has not been so fully maintained, a marked improvement is discernible, and we have no doubt that complete Sunday closing would be entirely in harmony with the feelings and sentiments of the Welsh people."

MR. YOUNGER (Ayr Burghs): Where do you find that?

MR. McKENNA: That was in the Minority Report signed by Lord Peel. He would now read the Majority Report. The Commission, of course, included direct representatives of the trade. The Majority reported—

"We see no reason to dissent from the general conclusions of the Royal Commission which inquired into this subject in 1890."

That was Lord Balfour of Burleigh's Commission—

"We are of opinion that in Wales, as a whole, Sunday closing has been a success, especially in rural Wales, and that if in places as in Cardiff, success has not been so fully maintained, improvement is discernible."

Both those Royal Commissions were appointed by Conservative Governments, and both, after full investigation of the facts, had come to a conclusion directly opposite to that which the right hon. Gentleman now asked them to accept. While he fully admitted that had the right hon. Gentleman's objection been well founded it would have been so formidable as not to be overcome, nevertheless all the authentic facts went to show that the special treatment of Wales had been a success, and so far as experience went the Government were justified in acting on that precedent.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR asked the right hon. Gentleman whether he had any figures later than those at the time of the Peel Commission.

MR. McKENNA said he should have thought that the Reports of the two Commissions were the best evidence. They had the Act of 1881, they had the report for nine years in 1890, and another report upwards of ten years later. There was no reason to suppose that such an accumulation of evidence

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: You are giving them entirely different powers.

MR. McKENNA said they were giving them different powers, following well-established precedents for dealing with licences in a different way in Wales from that in England. He was only dealing now with the financial part of the proposals, and he had shown that what the right hon. Gentleman accepted as proper as between two English counties, he did not accept as proper as between a group of Welsh and a group of English counties. But the real answer to the right hon. Gentleman was this. They had established through the whole country for all purposes one fund which had one great duty to perform equally over the whole country, in England and Wales alike, with no distinction in regard to the habits of magistrates. But one small portion of the fund was going to be dealt with differently. It would be a great mistake to break up the whole unity of their finance in order to separate Welsh and English finance. It was agreed that they could not break up the financial system as between different English counties, although the right hon. Gentleman's argument was absolutely appropriate to that. Therefore, while much could be made of the apparent injustice of English money being used to contribute to the compensation of Welsh licences, nevertheless it did not appear necessarily to follow that any English money would be paid at all, because the surplus might come entirely out of the Welsh contribution, and if any money collected in England went for the purpose of compensating Welsh licences it could be only such a small amount that it would be most undesirable to break up the whole financial scheme. There was no substantial reason for doing so, and the Government proposed to adhere to the clause as it stood on that point. Then the right hon. Gentleman complained that they were extending the reduction by a bare majority. His hon. and learned friend had stated that as regarded local veto a two-thirds majority would be required, and it was proposed to incorporate into this clause the same terms that they had incorporated in Clause 3. On the reduction resolutions it would stand as in the Bill at a bare majority.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am not sure that I quite understand what the proposal is. I thought that under the Bill Welsh constituencies were allowed to reduce licences to the point of extinction—that means, of course, local veto. I thought they were allowed to do that by a bare majority, and that that was going to stand.

MR. McKENNA said it did not stand. A resolution might be one of three kinds. Let them take a place with a given population which according to the schedule would allow the district to have three public-houses. The first resolution would be carried by a bare majority reducing the three to two, a second resolution might be carried by a bare majority reducing the three to one, or a third resolution might be carried by a two-thirds majority, taking away all three licences. That was the Bill as it would stand when the Government introduced their Amendment.

MR. WYNDHAM (Dover): Take, for example, a ward in a town like Cardiff, where there is a number of public-houses, of which I understand in addition to the statutory reduction a bare majority could extinguish all but one, and a two-thirds majority could extinguish the lot. That two-thirds majority would have a complete veto, but would a two-thirds majority be required to diminish the number below the standard reduction?

MR. McKENNA said it would not. Take the case of a district in which the number after the statutory reduction was 120. A resolution might be carried by a bare majority, allowing only 80 and another resolution allowing only 40 might be carried also by a bare majority. If it was required to reduce it below 40 a two-thirds majority would be necessary.

MR. WYNDHAM: That does not differ from what I said. It only requires a bare majority to go below the amount allowed by statutory reduction and you can go on till you get to the last house.

the country as a whole. Another question which the right hon. Gentleman had put to him concerned finance. He admitted frankly that if they proposed to treat England and Wales on a different financial footing there might, though not necessarily so, be some force in the objection taken by the right hon. Gentleman. The Commissioners were empowered to pay out of the surplus funds at their disposal all the compensation required to meet two sets of cases, that was to say, they were entitled to pay compensation out of their surplus funds in cases of optional reduction by the magistrates over and above the compulsory reduction. First of all Wales contributed to the whole fund, and if there was any surplus after paying compensation for the compulsory reduction, there would be a margin from the Welsh contribution, and therefore, the Commissioners would have at their disposal Welsh funds exclusively derived from Wales.

MR. YOUNGER pointed out that if all the licences were extinguished by local veto there would be no fund whatever from Wales.

MR. McKENNA said they might assume upon this clause that something which was not possible under the Bill would happen, but although verbally they might argue as if it were possible, yet it would not be possible to extinguish all licences. The Commissioners in such circumstances would not have funds with which to do it.

MR. YOUNGER: The Bill says so.

MR. McKENNA said the Bill certainly gave the Commissioners the option out of surplus funds to pay compensation for any reduction over and above the compulsory statutory reduction, but the Commissioners would only have a certain limited amount of money at their disposal, and they could only out of that limited money pay for the extra reduction to the extent it would permit; but if they had to finance the scheme they would never have enough money at their disposal to enable them to do what the hon. Gentleman suggested.

MR. YOUNGER asked whether, in case these resolutions were passed and licences were extinguished, they would be unable to pay compensation.

MR. McKENNA said if the hon. Member looked at the clause he would find that it stood thus:—

“Except that the carrying out of the scheme for further reduction shall be subject to the sanction of the Licensing Commission from the financial point of view.”

So that the Licensing Commission could only sanction these proposals for further reduction according to the amount of surplus money they had at their disposal.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said he had a very simple case to put to the right hon. Gentleman. They knew that probably the English magistrates in almost every district would regard the statutory reduction as meeting the necessities of the case in their district. That, however, from the point of view of Welsh Members might not meet the whole necessities of the case. He was told they wanted prohibition, and the only thing to stop them reaching total prohibition was the want of money. If the money was not used for England there would be a great deal of money left for Wales, so that English licensees would really be paying for total prohibition in Wales.

MR. McKENNA said he must not be taken as necessarily agreeing that magistrates would not reduce licences in excess of the statutory amount, but assuming it was true, let them follow out the argument. Magistrates, they would assume, in the majority of cases, would not reduce beyond the statutory amount, but there would be certain justices who would. They would draw their money from the areas in which the magistrates would not reduce beyond the statutory amount, and would be reducing the expenditure in those areas. What he accepted as true of different parts of England this modern separatist refused to go over the Border and do for Wales. He said Lancashire and Yorkshire were one integral part of England, but the Welsh counties were to be treated on a different footing.

about him, though in attempting to discover what were the principles which had led him to the conclusion that he ultimately reached, he had not perhaps shown all his customary lucidity. In dealing with this clause there was not present in the House a single Member representing the very considerable minority in Wales. That there was a considerable minority he did not think even the most advanced member of the party of Welsh Liberalism would deny. He wished to apply a test to the right hon. Gentleman's observations. In the earlier part of his speech he expressed the opinion that special legislation in Wales had been a very great success, and he had quoted two Commissions with the object of establishing that conclusion. Had his attention been drawn to a Report by the Chief Constable of Monmouthshire in 1904, which was of much more recent date than that of the Commissions, in which that official said the Welsh Sunday Closing Act was a nuisance to the county, causing constant complaints of drunkenness along the border, and expressed the opinion that if the Sunday Closing Act were extended to Monmouthshire drunkenness and disorder would largely increase. That might show that opinion was not entirely one-sided in the matter. He would also like to ask whether some figures which had been supplied to him were correct and, if so, what was the explanation of them. He was told that in Glamorganshire the number of licences per 10,000 of population was twenty-four, but the charges for drunkenness per 10,000 of population were eighty-seven, while in Monmouthshire there were thirty-nine convictions and thirty-seven houses per 10,000 of population. If one compared Carnarvon with Somerset, the number of on-licences per 10,000 of population was 28 in Carnarvon and 40 in Somerset, but the convictions for drunkenness in Carnarvon were 55, and in Somerset 20. Carnarvonshire was a county with which the Chancellor of the Exchequer was very familiar. The argument was strengthened if one compared the counties in England and Wales having the highest and lowest number of convictions for drunkenness to population. In Northumberland there were 20 on-licences per 10,000 population, and the convictions for drunkenness were 146. In Glamorganshire with 24 on-licences to 10,000 population, the convictions for drunkenness were 87. In Oxfordshire with 65 on-licences per 10,000 population, the convictions for drunkenness were 11. In Cardiganshire with 47 on-licences per 10,000 population the convictions for drunkenness were 25. These figures showed that the most sober county in Wales had more than twice as many drunkenness convictions as the most sober county of England although it had fewer public-houses. How these figures could be made to support the case which had been put forward on behalf of the Government he had very considerable difficulty in understanding. But the right hon. Gentleman passed on from that and said that England must wait for her local option and continued—"I should like to see local option to-morrow, but I am not satisfied that there is a majority in favour of it." If the right hon. Gentleman was not satisfied to-day that there was a majority in favour of local option in England, why on earth should he embody in an Act of Parliament the provision that in fourteen years, England, of whose opinions he would then probably know less, should be ordered to have local option? The right hon. Gentleman added that English opinion was not as advanced as Welsh opinion, and he gathered the view below the gangway to be that there was an overwhelming preponderance of opinion in Wales in favour of applying the facilities which this clause would give. Then why was it necessary to insist on a bare majority instead of the three-fourths or two-thirds which they had in England after the fourteen years? If they had so large a majority to play with, they might at least have given those whom they were going to dispossess the advantage of requiring that two-thirds majority which, with their great enthusiasm and superior numbers, they would have no difficulty at all in providing. The right hon. Gentleman had actually condescended to the argument, totally unworthy of anyone who sat on the front bench, that because private Members'

MR. McKENNA: No, the last 40 houses, one-third of 120. It had been argued that a system of local option amounted to a local tyranny. It must not be overlooked that in large tracts of Wales at the present moment what was described as tyranny when it was done by the vote of a majority was actually done by the action of individual landlords. In Wales there was no infeasible right for anybody to have a public-house within a convenient distance of where he lived. They could go over areas extending into many thousands of acres in the whole of which they would not find a single licensed house, simply because the landlord would not allow it. If nobody regarded that as tyranny why should it be tyranny because a majority of the inhabitants refused to have licensed premises dumped down in the area in which they lived? It was no question of tyranny at all. It might be wise or unwise, but to attack it on the ground of tyranny was to overlook the whole course of their history, and the actual facts under which they lived. They did, down to 1904, give certain magistrates a discretion to deprive any area they pleased of its licensed houses, and they proposed under this Bill to restore that power. That had never been described as tyranny. He found in one case in Carnarvonshire all the landlords combined together in seven adjoining parishes, covering an area roughly of 10,000 acres in which no licensed house was allowed. In another case of four adjoining parishes covering an area of about 8,000 acres no licensed premises were allowed by the landlord. There were in Anglesey nine adjoining parishes where no public-house was allowed. If it was not tyranny for the landlords—

SEVERAL HON. MEMBERS: It is tyranny.

MR. McKENNA said this was a new attack upon the rights of property. They were told there was only one tyrannous use of the sacred rights of property, when the landlord refused to allow beer to be sold. There were numerous other cases where the rights of property were exercised in the same tyrannous manner, covering in one case a group of parishes of 14,000 acres, in another of 21,000 acres, and in another an individual parish, 30,000 acres. The population, in the first case was 2,670; in the second, 3,261; and in the third, 5,398. That had been tolerated and allowed all the while the last Government was in office, and never until that minute had any supporter of the right hon. Gentleman described the action of landlords in this respect as tyranny. If the procedure in the past had been intolerable they were doing nothing worse. If the landlord had a right to declare that no licensed premises should exist on his property, on which he might not even live, the people who lived on the property ought to have an equal right to determine whether there should or should not be licensed premises. The conditions in Maine did not apply in the present case. Portland, Maine, was a city in a prohibition area covering a whole State, and no doubt there was opposed to the system a large minority who broke the law. In the Government proposal no such conditions as these could possibly arise. The area was going to be a small one and wherever there was a majority of people who required to have facilities for getting intoxicating liquors they would vote against the adoption of the clause. They would have the law in their own hands. If the clause was to be opposed it should be opposed as what it was, a very limited measure of local option. The Bill of 1881 was in many respects similar to this clause. In that Bill there were three resolutions, one for local veto, one for a reduction of licences, and a third prohibiting the grant of new licences. The principle of the Bill was the same and in detail it was almost the same. With the experience they had had of the successful working of special legislation for Wales the Committee would be well advised in allowing this experiment of local option, which was in conformity with the wishes of the Welsh people, to be adopted, and to wait for the future before they came to a conclusion as to what its operation would be.

MR. F. E. SMITH (Liverpool, Walton) said that the right hon. Gentleman, like the hero of a well-known ballad, had argued high and argued low and argued round about him, though in attempting to discover what were the principles which had led him to the conclusion that he ultimately reached, he had not perhaps shown all his customary lucidity. In dealing with this clause there was not present in the House a single Member representing the very considerable minority in Wales. That there was a considerable minority he did not think even the most advanced member of the party of Welsh Liberalism would deny. He wished to apply a test to the right hon. Gentleman's observations. In the earlier part of his speech he expressed the opinion that special legislation in Wales had been a very great success, and he had quoted two Commissions with the object of establishing that conclusion. Had his attention been drawn to a Report by the Chief Constable of Monmouthshire in 1904, which was of much more recent date than that of the Commissions, in which that official said the Welsh Sunday Closing Act was a nuisance to the county, causing constant complaints of drunkenness along the border, and expressed the opinion that if the Sunday Closing Act were extended to Monmouthshire drunkenness and disorder would largely increase. That might show that opinion was not entirely one-sided in the matter. He would also like to ask whether some figures which had been supplied to him were correct and, if so, what was the explanation of them. He was told that in Glamorganshire the number of licences per 10,000 of population was twenty-four, but the charges for drunkenness per 10,000 of population were eighty-seven, while in Monmouthshire there were thirty-nine convictions and thirty-seven houses per 10,000 of population. If one compared Carnarvon with Somerset, the number of on-licences per 10,000 of population was 28 in Carnarvon and 40 in Somerset, but the convictions for drunkenness in Carnarvon were 55, and in Somerset 20. Carnarvonshire was a county with which the Chancellor of the Exchequer was very familiar. The argument was strengthened if one compared the counties in England and Wales having the highest and lowest number of convictions for drunkenness to population. In Northumberland there were 20 on-licences per 10,000 population, and the convictions for drunkenness were 145. In Glamorganshire with 24 on-licences to 10,000 population, the convictions for drunkenness were 87. In Oxfordshire with 65 on-licences per 10,000 population, the convictions for drunkenness were 11. In Cardiganshire with 47 on-licences per 10,000 population the convictions for drunkenness were 25. These figures showed that the most sober county in Wales had more than twice as many drunkenness convictions as the most sober county of England although it had fewer public-houses. How these figures could be made to support the case which had been put forward on behalf of the Government he had very considerable difficulty in understanding. But the right hon. Gentleman passed on from that and said that England must wait for her local option and continued—"I should like to see local option to-morrow, but I am not satisfied that there is a majority in favour of it." If the right hon. Gentleman was not satisfied to-day that there was a majority in favour of local option in England, why on earth should he embody in an Act of Parliament the provision that in fourteen years, England, of whose opinions he would then probably know less, should be ordered to have local option? The right hon. Gentleman added that English opinion was not as advanced as Welsh opinion, and he gathered the view below the gateway to be that there was an overwhelming preponderance of opinion in Wales in favour of applying the facilities which this clause would give. Then why was it necessary to insist on a bare majority instead of the three-fourths or two-thirds which they had in England after the fourteen years? If they had so large a majority to play with, they might at least have given those whom they were going to dispossess the advantage of requiring that two-thirds majority which, with their great enthusiasm and superior numbers, they would have no difficulty at all in providing. The right hon. Gentleman had actually condescended to the argument, totally unworthy of anyone who sat on the front bench, that because private Members

Bills had been passed year after year, therefore, it must be assumed that the subject was ripe for legislation according to the sense of those private Bills. It was only a short time ago since the Miners' Eight Hours Bill, which was passed repeatedly as a private Member's Bill, was condemned by a Committee appointed by the Government. The real truth, of course, was that no importance, or very little, was to be attached to a decision of the House on a private Member's Bill. Over and over again Woman Suffrage Bills had been passed and a great majority of hon. Gentlemen on the opposite side were pledged to the reform. He did not gather that the Government, in spite of the educational experience of the Chancellor of the Exchequer in a well known police court, were intending to introduce a Bill giving effect to the principle. The most astonishing argument of all that the right hon. Gentleman had put forward was that in which he attempted to deal with his right hon. friend's criticism on the financial aspect of his proposal. His right hon. friend had pointed out that they were giving Wales what he might describe as some special moral advantage, though why it should be given to Wales remained a little obscure; but after examining the arguments put forward, he gathered it was not because Wales was more drunken and had greater need of moral advantage—although that was the explanation which would readily occur to the superficial mind—but because the majority in Wales desired it, and no other argument had ever been put forward. This moral advantage also by a singular coincidence connoted no small degree of financial benefit to the Principality. If, therefore, they were going to support a claim to a special financial benefit for a part of the country which which was very often proudly described by those who belonged to it as "gallant little Wales" on the principle that the majority desired it, they were very likely to have Scottish and Irish majorities who might take a similar view. How did the right hon. Gentleman meet that? He said that if Lancashire did not want a reduction and Somerset did, the Lancashire fund might be tapped for the benefit of Somerset. The difference was this, that the Lancashire drunkard enjoyed the same prospect of moral reform that the Somerset drunkard enjoyed. Here their grievance was that to the Welsh drunkard was given a special and a very costly opportunity of reforming his alcoholic tendencies, and that opportunity was to be paid for not by other Welsh drunkards or publicans, but by English who themselves received no benefit and who had not even the compensating advantage of seeing a moral improvement proceeding around them in their own neighbourhood. If that was really the best argument that could be put forward against the financial objection it was one, he thought, the proposal would require very considerable recommendation by quite different argument to any put forth up to the present moment. The right hon. Gentleman said further that there might be no recourse at all to the English fund, that it might be forthcoming out of the Welsh fund, so that the Welsh publican, instead of getting advantage, might have to pay to the English fund. But he did not think in saying that the right hon. Gentleman could have considered the terms of his own Bill or entirely appreciated the warmth of enthusiasm for temperance reform which he assured the Committee had affected the bosoms of the Welsh. What did the clause empower the Welsh people to do? It empowered Wales, first of all, to take advantage of the provisions of the Bill for statutory reduction. Nobody would say that that was on an inconsiderable scale, but that was not sufficient for the moral desires, or perhaps, he ought to say, the moral necessities of Wales, and therefore, the avenue of optional reduction was also thrown open to those aspirants to a higher standard of alcoholic morality. Statutory reduction plus optional reduction was given them. Still they were not satisfied, and they came forward and said that where a bare majority was desirous of accelerating the progress of reduction, although it became three times what the progress would be under statutory plus optional reduction, they should be entitled to do so. [AN HON. MEMBER: Hear, hear.] He gathered that the view of the hon. Member below the gangway was that the people of Wales were panting to take advantage of the facilities under the Bill. Was it not feeling on this question in Wales than in England. All through, the magistrates in Wales helped the police, coming as they did into intimate touch with them on that score, and in almost every centre there was a vigilance committee to help the police and strengthen their administration, with the result that there were increased convictions. In his own native county of Anglesey there were thirty-two parishes which had no public-houses; and there would have been more had it not been for the Act of 1904. These public-houses had been closed at the instance of the moral sense and public feeling of the overwhelming majority of the inhabitants. In a parish of that county there was a public-house which was said to be kept going, as far as the sale of liquor was concerned, by one farmer. The sober-minded people determined to get rid of it and so remove the temptation in the interests of their children, and they appealed against the renewal of the licence. The owners of this tied-house resisted this appeal in two Courts, but in vain; and when they threatened to take the case to another, a brave woman—one of the strong leaders of temperance in the district—declared she would charter a special train to convey all the inhabitants, save that one farmer, to appear against the brewers. The town where he was bred in North Wales was the centre of county government; it contained the County Court; it was where the county council and its committees and all the educational committees held their meetings. It was a place where the farmers from all parts of Anglesey did their marketing. When he was a lad there were twenty-six public-houses in the town. Now, with a growing population, and when it had increased in importance, the number of public-houses had dwindled down to eight, owing to the moral feeling of the people. He never had been a fanatic, although he had been a total abstainer all his life. His point of view was that they ought never to legislate too far in advance of the moral and social sentiment of the community; and he was convinced from experience and knowledge that the moral sentiment of the people of Wales, with the exception of one or two centres, was in favour of local option. A plébiscite had been taken of all the counties in North Wales by a committee largely composed of Tories and churchmen. The result of that plébiscite was that nearly 30 per cent. of the householders who voted were in favour of local option and a large percentage went for prohibition. Evidence in regard to this plébiscite was given before the Peel Commission; and in reply to a question by the hon. Member for Ayr Burghs, as to who were of the number who signed for prohibition, the witness answered that it was the drunkards in the place, and that they wanted prohibition as a protection against themselves. The hon. Gentleman, when he got that answer, said that the proportion who had voted for local option was extraordinary. The moral feeling in Wales was so strong that throughout the length and breadth of the land no candidate for Parliament dared stand up unless he was wholesome and square on this matter; no Labour Member even could have been returned for any part of Wales without giving a pledge, not merely that he was in favour of the disestablishment of the Welsh Church, but that he was also in favour of local option. They wanted to free their country, and make it advance more and more. They were doing it to the admiration of the civilised world in the matter of education. They had only begun in earnest on that question forty years ago. Let them be given a chance also to regulate the licensing question after their own desire. Let them have facilities to cripple and destroy social and moral temptations so that they might raise still higher the level of their citizens and help Wales to make greater advances in progress for the sake of the Empire and mankind.

EARL WINTERTON (Sussex, Horsham) said they had heard a great deal from the hon. Member who had just sat down about the moral feelings and the moral elevation of Wales, but few of them on that side of the House were disposed to enter into an argument with him as to how far the morality of Wales was in advance of that of England. Welshmen in the past had had the very unenviable reputation, and a very unjust one no doubt, of forcibly possessing themselves of other people's goods.

country. He would point out also that whether or not they had the right to do it, the consequence of doing it had been very little encouraging in those districts where some partial attempt had been made in that direction. The Solicitor-General could inform them if he were present how many drinking clubs had been started in his constituency during the period of Sunday closing. He agreed with the statement of the right hon. Member for Spen Valley, who had given great attention to this subject, that although local option might have produced improved results in country areas it had never produced satisfactory results in any crowded or urban districts. The experience of the civilised world was against this scheme. It was proposed to carry this scheme, tyrannous as he thought, futile as the right hon. Member for Spen Valley thought, and to apply this panacea to Wales at the expense of England, and he as an English Member objected to that course.

*MR. WILLIAM JONES said the speech of the hon. Member did not show much knowledge of Welsh opinion or of the Welsh counties. He made comparisons between great industrial centres in Wales and comparatively agricultural centres in England. Somerset was brought into it, but it was a comparatively agricultural county, and a vast proportion of its population was constantly getting over the border into Glamorgan and Monmouthshire. He did not want to impugn the character of Somerset, but it was constantly alleged by police and other authorities in South Wales that many who crossed the borders were among the most intemperate persons in Wales. He could easily get reports from Glamorganshire and Monmouthshire which would bear out his contention to the fullest extent. A great industrial centre like Glamorganshire contained one of the most important and most cosmopolitan seaports in the world. Why, if one went through the streets of Cardiff on a Saturday night one did not know whom they were rubbing against. The places where public-houses had been planted were dark alleys and slums whose condition was as bad as could be found in the lowest centres of English towns. [A MEMBER on the OPPOSITION Benches: They are all Liberals, are they not?] The great difficulty they had in Cardiff was the clearing of the slums. The right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition had himself appointed a Commission at the instance of the Cardiff brewers and others to investigate Welsh Sunday closing, and the result was that a most vigorous recommendation was passed for the continuance of Sunday closing by Lord Balfour of Burleigh's Commission, together with a strong plea for its extension to Monmouthshire. When Lord Peel's Commission investigated the same question the hon. Member for Ayr Burghs signed the majority Report in favour of including Monmouthshire. Not only did the minority advocate the extension of Sunday closing to Monmouthshire, but the majority did, including representatives of brewing firms—the hon. Gentleman himself being one of the number. In Glamorganshire the figures were 87·07 per cent. of convictions per 10,000 of the population. Let them compare Glamorganshire not with Somerset or Gloucestershire or any other agricultural county in England, but with Northumberland and Durham—great mining centres—and it would be found that the result was very different. In Durham the figures were 101·59; in Northumberland they were 146·22. He was not going to base his argument entirely on convictions. The hon. Gentleman made another interesting comparison between Cardiganshire and Oxfordshire. He knew both counties well. Oxford was a purely inland county; Cardigan had a seaboard, and for four or five months of the year there was an immense influx of visitors all along the coast. But that was not all. In all the Welsh counties invariably—and he challenged any contradiction—the moral feeling, sentiment, and opinion of the people were so strong that the police dared not relax their effort to convict for drunkenness.

MR. F. E. SMITH asked if the hon. Gentleman suggested that the police in Oxfordshire were drunken?

*MR. WILLIAM JONES said that his point was that there was a stronger in Wales, or why Wales should be made the dumping ground of an exotic experiment. He appealed to the Government to give them some statistics to show the result of the restrictions already in vogue there, and to justify their introduction of a clause which had no connection with the rest of the Bill and which only tended to make confusion worse confounded.

MR. WILLIAM ABRAHAM (Glamorganshire, Rhondda) said he was not able to follow the debate very closely, and he did not think it was necessary that he should do so. The great point was: Were there any facts to prove that prohibiting drink had been beneficial to the people? That was the question. He represented one of the largest mining constituencies in Great Britain, and he remembered the time when he first went there, before the passing of Sunday closing. He remembered the condition of the public roads through drunkenness on Sunday afternoons, and very sorry he was to see them. It was a condition of things that one was almost ashamed to mention. He remembered the time when, on coming out of chapel after eight o'clock on a Sunday evening, he had seen men coming out of the public-house in a drunken condition. Then Sunday closing came, and in less than two years it removed completely all that condition of drunkenness. One fact like that was worth a ton of argument. What happened afterwards? Sunday clubs became popular, and things became worse in regard to drunkenness than they were originally. The hon. Member for one of the divisions of Liverpool had taunted them with the fact that the number of public-houses that were open on Sundays was somewhat against their moral aspirations. That was a most unfortunate statement to have made. What happened? The only gentleman who could be found to fight him at the general election was a great traveller for whisky, and the one claim that he put forward for a right to sit for a Welsh constituency was that he had opened more Sunday clubs than any one else in the country. That was not very creditable to the Party opposite, because three out of every four clubs in a mining constituency were purely drinking clubs, lions dens, homes of temptation for the people who, before they were opened, were content to take their Sunday's dinner with their families and spend the day quietly. They had no temptation to drink. They had been taunted with the fact that in Monmouth where there was no Sunday closing there were no convictions for drunkenness, while in Glamorganshire where Sunday closing was in force there were many. Why? Let them take a place near Cardiff, just over the border of Monmouth, called Rhymney. People could not get drink in Cardiff on a Sunday, but every drunkard crossed the border, got drunk in Rhymney, and then they were caught and convicted in Cardiff.

EARL WINTERTON said the hon. Member had misunderstood his quotation. What he intended to convey was that this system of restriction did not prevent the illicit sale of liquor.

MR. WILLIAM ABRAHAM said the fact was as he had stated, and it was sufficient for him. If hon. Members could go down and see the effect of drink on Sunday, through the opening of these clubs, they would say: "Close them all, close every hotel, pothouse, and club." All that the Welsh Members said was that if an opportunity was given to the people to drink they would drink; they wanted their little country clean, and they appealed to the House to help them to prevent the opening of these clubs and public-houses, and to prevent the opportunity for drinking. He had put the fact before the House, and on that one fact he justified the passing of this Bill into law.

LORD R. CECIL (Marylebone, E.) said that in the course of the debate he had been privileged to hear a good many speeches from the Ministerial side of the House from time to time. The observations that were made in the extremely eloquent speech of the hon. Member for the Arfon division of Carnarvon were not open to the same, but to similar objections as those in the speeches of hon. Members who had preceded him. The strength of the hon. Member's speech lay, not in the arguments he had adduced, but in the

Some of their most distinguished representatives at the present time seemed, however, rather disposed to live up to that reputation. The question they had to deal with was not the vague and ambiguous question dealt with by the hon. Gentleman in his speech. He would say nothing further about the question whether the moral feeling and sentiment of Wales were better or worse than the moral feeling and sentiment of England, except that he deprecated very strongly attempts to treat Wales as a separate part of the United Kingdom. The Leader of the Opposition and other hon. Members had shown by statistics of convictions for drunkenness that Wales was very much worse than England, and certain references had been made by the hon. Member who had just spoken to some views expressed by magistrates and others in Wales. He did not propose to weary the Committee by quoting statistics, but he would like to quote the view of the Stipendiary Magistrate for Cardiff, expressed in 1895. He said it was not his duty to propose a remedy, but to state what was proved by daily proceedings that on the day when the licensed houses were closed there was a demand by a large section of the community for intoxicating liquor, and that that demand was supplied in clubs. The Committee had to deal in this proposal virtually with prohibition. The First Lord of the Admiralty shook his head, but they were dealing with the chance of actual prohibition being put into force. That was what they had really got to face. He did not propose to continue the argument as to whether or not statistics of drunkenness in Wales could be compared with those of drunkenness in England, except to say that an argument such as that the police in Glamorgan were better or more pure than those in Oxford, was to be deprecated. It was impossible to answer such an argument. They were always met with this difficulty when they dealt with Welsh questions, because Welsh institutions and individuals were always claimed to be so superior to other institutions and people. Facts and statistics, however, were not always on the side of the Welsh people. It was exceedingly difficult to get accurate and comparable statistics of drunkenness for different countries and districts, but he denied altogether that the state of affairs in Wales was better than that in any English county. He would take figures which were a real test of relative morality and temperance. In Wales, in 1898, there were no less than 679 prosecutions for illicit sale of drink; and in 1905, out of a total of 261 prosecutions for the illicit sale of drink in England and Wales, no less than 112 were in Wales, though the Principality was but a twentieth of the size of England. That really was a test, whatever might be the case with prosecutions for drunkenness. There was no doubt that, if they took the statistics of prosecutions for illicit sale, the restrictions on the trade in Wales were not a success. He also found that in 1905 there were ninety-one prosecutions in Glamorgan with Sunday closing, and none in Monmouthshire without Sunday closing. He would ask the Solicitor-General whether he did not think that that was an argument against Sunday closing. The Solicitor-General had referred to two Royal Commissions, one of which reported in 1889, and the other in 1899; but the statistics of prosecutions for the illicit sale of drink which he had quoted were of later date, so that the opinions of those Royal Commissions could not be accepted as final. They were entitled to ask the Government, as they had constantly done, what had been the effect of the restrictions which had already been put upon the licensed trade in Wales. They had never answered that question. Could they really honestly say that the results had been so satisfactory as to warrant them in placing further restrictions upon the trade? They had pressed for an answer to that question and also to the equally important question as to what countries these were where such a system of prohibition as was proposed in this section had been successful. No answer had yet been given. He strongly deprecated these appeals to Welsh national feeling and sentiment. This was an Imperial House of Parliament, and had to deal with questions from a general point of view. They were not dealing with a foreign country, but with a part of the United Kingdom; and they had no evidence to show why this system should be put in practice in Wales, or why Wales should be made the dumping ground of an exotic experiment. He appealed to the Government to give them some statistics to show the result of the restrictions already in vogue there, and to justify their introduction of a clause which had no connection with the rest of the Bill and which only tended to make confusion worse confounded.

LORD R. CECIL (Marylebone, E.) said that in the course of the debate he had been privileged to hear a great many speeches from the Ministers side of the House from time to time. The observations that were made in the extremely eloquent speech of the hon. Member for the Arfon division of Carnarvon were not open to the same, but to similar objections as those in the speeches of hon. Members who had preceded him. The strength of the hon. Member's speech lay, not in the arguments he had adduced, but in the very powerful appeal he made to the moral sympathy and the imagination of the House. He had been so affected by the appeal that he was driven to ask what really were the moral interests involved? Hon. Members constantly spoke as if intemperance in drink was the only moral evil in the world. [Cries of "No."] If that appeared to be an exaggerated estimate he would amend it and say that hon. Members believed that it was the chief and most important moral evil in the world. But that was exactly where he differed from them. That was where, much as he admired it, he was not able to follow the eloquent appeal of the hon. Member for the Arfon division. He did not regard intemperance as the principal, or the most serious, evil that affected the people at the present time. There appeared to him to be serious moral and intellectual evils which affected them more from a moral and civic point of view. He regarded intolerance and uncharitableness as a moral evil of as great importance as intemperance. He did not think a more effective answer could have been given to the speech of the hon. Member for the Arfon Division than that of the hon. Gentleman to whom the Committee had just listened. The hon. Member for the Rhondda Valley said there was a great amount of intemperance in Wales; that after Sunday-closing came into operation secret drinking clubs sprang up everywhere. What was the result? They had certainly increased deceit and probably other moral evils.

MR. WILLIAM ABRAHAM said he must not be taken as admitting the arguments of the noble Lord. He did not say secret drinking clubs. Moreover, many of these clubs had been opened for political purposes.

LORD R. CECIL thought that so far as political clubs were concerned no doubt the hon. Member and his friends in Wales regarded these drinking-clubs as Tory clubs, but if he moved in Tory circles in London he would find that all these drinking-clubs were Radical clubs.

MR. WILLIAM ABRAHAM remarked that he was not concerned with the political aspect, but the truth.

LORD R. CECIL replied that they were all in this House concerned with the truth. If they had legislation of this kind, not only was it very doubtful that they would reduce intemperance, but it was perfectly certain that they would run very serious risk of bringing other moral evils to the community. It seemed to him one of those strange perversions of mind which sometimes affected bodies of men in all parts of the world, that those who, he was convinced, thought they were working for morality, should be running the risk of doing infinite moral harm by legislation which they believed was going to improve the morality of their fellow countrymen. He could not help comparing the morality on these topics, of which they had had such brilliant expositions that afternoon, with true Christian morality as he understood it. He did not find that this one sin was put in a position of predominance in any authorised form of Christian morality. He found hypocrisy, untruthfulness, intolerance, and uncharity held up, but he did not find it said that excessive indulgence in alcoholic liquor was the main or chief moral evil of the world. For his own part he believed that the moral effects of legislation were so very doubtful and so uncertain that it was madness in that House to trust to that argument in passing or refusing to pass any particular measure of legislation. They could do something to see what would be its effects, not on the morality of the people, but on their civic qualities. For his part he believed that this excessive restriction was a very doubtful benefit from the point of view of temperance, and was certain to be injurious to the interests of liberty and independence, which he regarded as of supreme importance from the civic point of view. He would heartily vote for the Amendment before the House.

MR. ELLIS DAVIES (Carnarvonshire, Eifion) said in the general discussion that afternoon some members had spoken of the tyranny of prohibiting the sale of liquor, but as a matter of fact that was already done by two authorities in the country. In the first place, landowners had the power and exercised it. A landlord could prohibit the sale of liquor on his property. Lord P—— extinguished all licences except two in a populous district ten miles long, with very beneficial effect. The other authority who had power to restrict the sale of liquor were the licensing magistrates, and the real question at issue so far as this portion of the Bill was concerned was whether the restrictive power was to be held by justices or the public. In the county of Merioneth the statutory number of licences would be more by ten than the existing number of licences, and if any temperance reform was to be carried out it must be by reducing the number of licences in Merionethshire below the statutory number. In the same way, in his own county of Carnarvon the number of licences was 366, while the statutory number would only be 311. He was quite sure that the House would agree with him that the reduction of more than 55 licences must take place during the next fifteen years. No one had any doubt as to the necessity for reduction, because it must be perfectly well known to any one who took an interest in licensing questions that there were thousands of houses carried on, not because they were necessary, but for the purpose of getting compensation, and they were carelessly and badly conducted. They found continually in licensing cases that houses were being carried on at a loss. He knew of one case in which, when the sheriff went into possession, everything in the house was sold lock, stock, and empty barrel for the magnificent sum of £5, and yet Quarter Sessions, when the house was taken, gave £400 compensation. The whole question at issue was whether the power to restrict the number of licences should be given to the magistrates or to the public. No attempt had been power of the justices. Justice had referred to monetary terms, but well known that was passed because had no confidence in justices. The right Member for South in that House on

He denies the justices use of their powers, but we object to their doing so in what we regard as an arbitrary way as with certain benches of justices."

The culprits no doubt included the Farnham justices, and one wondered if the attitude of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Kingston was a form of deferred repentance for the stand he took as chairman of the Surrey Sessions in confirming and praising the decision of the Farnham justices. Even the Licensing Commission, with its array of brewers, did not defend the justices, and the majority suggested the introduction of an elective element to the extent of one-third, and the minority to the extent of one half. Might he also point out that the Local Government Act of 1888 vested the power of licensing in a public body, namely, the county council. It had been asked why this clause was extended to Wales. The answer was obvious—because Wales demanded it. The right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition had pressed the point as to whether they were morally superior or morally inferior, but the real question was whether the measure would improve the moral and social condition of the people. He submitted that the most competent to deal with this subject were the people themselves. It was not that Committee, but the electors whom they represented in that House who were in the best position to decide for themselves what was for their moral good. If hon. Members were afraid to apply this clause to England then let them apply it to Wales alone. The Welsh people were quite prepared to run the risk. If they failed their's would be the consequences and with England would rest the advantages. On the other hand, if they were successful, and if this clause proved to be for the social well-being of the community, then it might be that in the near future it would be applied to England.

SIR GILBERT PARKER (Gravesend) said he should dislike to think that any one of his fellow Members thought him unsympathetic towards temperance reform. He felt, and had always felt, that the reduction of public-houses judiciously accomplished with fair compensation could only be productive of good. He had never held any other opinion. He supported the Bill of 1904 upon that basis. He would support this Bill if he did not find in its financial clauses, dealing with compensation and the time-limit, what he believed to be an element of injustice. If he believed that the local option clause in this Bill would really accomplish what it was thought it would achieve, he would support it. His hon. friend opposite who had made so eloquent a speech had caught them all up on a moral wave for an instant, and they felt that they would be doing a cruel and unfair thing if they did not help gallant little Wales to make the most of herself. In sympathy, in fairness, and in justice, they were to pay tribute to the avowed policy of the people of Wales; that was what the hon. Gentleman said. If he believed that what the hon. Gentleman asked for would achieve the desired end he would support him. He would give his reasons why he did not think that in Wales, or in any other portion of the United Kingdom, it would accomplish the hon. Gentleman's object. We had tried in this country, as had been tried in all countries, sumptuary laws. In the middle ages there were sumptuary laws against heresy. What did they produce? Persecution and conspiracy. Local option in Wales would produce there what had been produced wherever it had been tried—persecution and conspiracy. Conspiracy consisted in people banding themselves together to break the law. He had seen the most awful scenes caused by drunkenness. He had seen them in London, on the River Nile, and in Rhodesia. He had seen the Kaffir drunk on Kaffir beer, and he had seen in the streets of New York, as in the streets of London, scenes which the human mind could hardly conceive. All that was drunkenness under legal conditions. It was "understood of the people," and at any rate it was the exercise of a human free-will. Perhaps he ought to say it was an abuse of human free-will, but at any rate it was an exercise of free-will. He had seen nothing to compare with the degrading experience he had witnessed in the evasion of the law in States and Provinces committed to prohibition, because there was not only the degradation of drunkenness but the deepest kind of degradation, namely, the moral degradation of a man furtively evading the law of his country whilst doing what he had a right to do, namely, to satisfy his physical desire for stimulants. Was there any hon. Member who would say that it was a crime to take stimulating drink? The exercise of free-will with regard to a stimulant could not be a crime. A state of things under which a man who was prevented by the will of his neighbour from exercising his own free-will to take stimulants either in moderation or in immoderation, and had to resort to the kind of evasion furtive, sinister, and vile, to which men had to resort in prohibition countries, could only produce and did produce upon the community at large a deleterious evil and had a depreciatory effect. Every one knew that in Canada, the United States and New York, the convictions for drunkenness had increased under the no-licence law. In Norway the increase of bottled sales had increased with the decrease of sales over the bar. Did anyone suggest that in those countries there had not been a degrading element produced in the body politic and in the civic life by the exercise of the will of the majority over the will of the minority? Hon. Members opposite conceived themselves to be the friends of liberty, the friends of free-will, and the friends of human rights. If there were ten men in Wales who desired drink and wished to exercise their will to drink stimulants, and 10,000 were to say to them: "No, you shall not have the opportunity to do it," he contended that the 10,000 had no right to prevent those ten citizens from the exercise of their free-will. [AN HON. MEMBER: One man does it sometimes.] Well, even the rights of one man ought to be protected. If there was one country in the world where respect was paid to the rights of individuals it was this country, and the hon. Member's interjection enabled him to say that if there was one man who in any town or village of Wales desired to exercise his free-will concerning a thing that was not a crime he should be permitted to do so. If the Chancellor of the Exchequer and his friends were only consistent in this he would be able to find some excuse, but they were not consistent, not even in Wales. That was almost unbelievable when they reviewed the political career of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. If they were going to apply local option, if they were going to apply the principles of temperance, why not apply them to off-licences as well as on-licences? The Chancellor of the Exchequer thought his suggestion was unreasonable, but he invited him to be consistent. If it was a good thing to destroy human free-will for the benefit of the mass, let them do it in a large way, and not in the twopenny-halfpenny pettifogging furtive way that was being adopted here. He would be perfectly willing never to touch a drop of drink again in his life if his fellow-citizens would agree to do the same. He would do it if the Government would agree to do the same. They wanted to be able to exercise their free-will and they were determined to exercise it as long as they could. An Act which imposed upon a minority local option such as was suggested for Wales was tyrannical. Did hon. Members even suggest that local option and prohibition votes represented the will of the people? He could not speak for Wales, but he could speak for other places, and he could safely say that they never did represent the will of the people. To take Canada, for instance, where they had tried local option and where it had been a failure.—[Cries of "No. no."] Yes, they passed a prohibitory law in Manitoba and then said: "No, we will not apply this law until we have tried it again upon the electorate." Then the electorate decided against it.

AN HON. MEMBER: Does the hon. Member state that Manitoba has not passed a local option law and that it is not on the Statute Book both for Manitoba and Ontario?

SIR GILBERT PARKER said local option law was on the Statute-book of both Ontario and Manitoba, but this clause applied to the whole of Wales, and they had been assured that the whole of Wales had combined to accept the principle of local option and to apply it. In Canada and the United States local option had always proved itself to be an invitation to the surrounding districts to abuse the law. The test at the polls was not a true test, because people found it difficult in some districts to give a vote against local option. He was speaking of the human tendency, because people would say if they voted against local option they would be showing a lack of sympathy with temperance and the upward movement of the people. How many people were affected? Most people went to the poll not to express a strong opinion upon the question at issue, but because their neighbours expected them to do so, and because if they did not vote they would be accused of having shown a lack of sympathy with the moral welfare of the people. Therefore the poll was not a true test, and this was shown by the experience of every district which had adopted local option or prohibition. The result had been in those districts that the law was continuously evaded. The hon. Member for the Romford division had described the rise of drinking clubs. Wales was full of drinking clubs. They knew from the convictions recorded that Wales was full of drunkenness. He did not say that Wales was a drunken country, but he was taking the records, which showed that Wales was full of drunkenness. Wherever they had had Sunday closing and had attempted to interfere with the will of the minority abuses had grown up. They would not contribute to national morality by interfering with the natural rights of man, nor would they make Wales sober by giving to a majority the right to interfere with the free exercise of the will of the minority.

*MR. MACLEAN (Bath) said he had made a personal study of the operation of the Sunday Closing Act in Cardiff and he was in a position to state that the administration of that restrictive law on personal tastes—perhaps the most difficult form of law to administer—had proved really successful, and, arguing from this experience, he expressed the opinion that Parliament might safely conduct this experiment of local option in Wales. Cardiff, with its large floating population, was a very difficult place to enforce legislation of this kind, but it could be made successful. Let them take, for example, the figures for drunkenness since the year 1895. During that year here were 576 convictions for drunkenness, whereas last year the number sank to 104. That was not explained by any laxity on the part of the police, because they had an extremely vigilant Chief Constable at Cardiff and a very effective police force, and those figures were striking. He believed there was in Cardiff a steady upward trend of public opinion in favour of trying the experiment of local option in Wales. Reference had been made to the state of things in 1895. He admitted that in that year there was a condition of lawlessness which called for serious consideration. Like many other laws the success of the laws dealing with the sale of drink depended largely upon the manner in which they were administered. In the year 1895 there was a large amount of drinking in shebeens and also in clubs, and in that year there were convictions for the illegal sale of drink amounting to 161. What was the position last year? The total convictions for illegal sale of drink were only seventeen. Then as to Sunday drunkenness. In the year 1895 there were eighty-seven convictions for drunkenness on Sundays, and last year there were only three. During the past four or five years it was accurate to say that the number of convictions for Sunday drunkenness in Cardiff would not exceed fifteen or eighteen. And who broke the law? They were persons who had been convicted previously of assaulting the police, brothel keepers, disorderly women, thieves, stray seamen, and others who could not be classified under any particular head, but who were declared by the police to be associates of thieves and disorderly women. Therefore those who broke the law were principally those of the ordinary criminal class of the community. Every one of the convictions for illicit trading took place in the criminal quarter of the town. He challenged anybody to go down to Cardiff on a Sunday and go to the roughest streets of the city, in the parts where the docks were situated, and prove that Cardiff would not bear comparison with any other like city in regard to public order, the quietness of the streets, and the demeanour of the inhabitants. Not long ago on a Sunday night he went into some of the lowest lodging-houses containing men of all nationalities, and he saw no sign of drinking, and there was not a single man there under the influence of drink. The result of the steady administration of this very difficult Act affecting the personal habits of men in an exceptionally difficult place had really proved successful.

*MR. YOUNGER, though adhering to everything he said as to Sunday-closing as one of the majority Commissioners on the Licensing Commission, insisted that the success or failure of Sunday-closing in Wales had no relevance to the question of prohibition which they were discussing. On the question of finance with which the Leader of the Opposition dealt they had not had any satisfactory explanation. The First Lord of the Admiralty was an extremely able man, and he was extremely able and slim in avoiding the uncomfortable points of any argument. The main point he dealt with was the similarity of treatment which Wales was to have in consonance with the treatment meted out to English counties. He told them that while the English counties were having similar treatment, the Opposition refused to grant similar treatment to Wales. In Wales, where prohibition might be carried into effect, the pull would be greater on the public funds. There was no analogy in the cases of English counties; nor was there any need for any theatrical display such as they had had to meet an argument calling the attention of the Committee to the point whether it was right to deny to Wales what they were granting to this country. Previous to 1904 the magistrates of England had not the absolute right to withdraw all licences in any district. That right was very carefully safeguarded, and the right hon. Gentleman opposite ought to have known that the Judges stated most distinctly that their decision gave no such right, but only the right to deal with each individual case on facts brought before them. So far as experience had gone in other countries they need not go far to find out what the result of prohibition had been. He had any number of cases which he could quote showing the effect in Canada. They knew the result of restrictions in the larger towns in Scotland, where they now had early closing, and they knew what a serious effect that had had on the drinking habits of the people, and how they had taken to drinking spirits instead of beer, which they had been accustomed to drink in the past. A serious state of affairs had arisen as the result of these restrictions. If prohibition were resorted to the evils would be infinitely worse than at present. He did not rise to discuss the general question at all, but he wished to say that so far as Sunday-closing was concerned it did not bear in the least upon this clause.

MR. WYNDHAM (Dover) said the Committee would have liked to have heard the Chancellor of the Exchequer on the question now before them. Those who had been attending these debates must have been struck with their lifeless character. It might be due in part to the fact that they were discussing the Bill under the closure Resolution, and in part to the fact that a great many of those who were supporting the proposals of the Government did not really believe that the Bill was going to find a place on the Statute-book; but that air of unreality and lack of vitality had been greater in regard to the proposal before them that day than upon any of the other proposals of the Government. It would seem to some of them that this child of theirs was not long for this world. If anybody could have galvanised the question into life it would have been the Chancellor of the Exchequer; he would have argued on the merits and made a more convincing plea than any of his compatriots in favour of the proposal that the Committee should defer without inquiry or examination to what they were told was the opinion of Wales. The hon. Member for Bath thought it incumbent on him to offer a word of explanation for daring to intervene at all in the debate; he said that, although he was not a Welshman he spent part of his time in Cardiff. He himself, and the Party to which he belonged, utterly denied that they had to qualify by residence in Wales in order to discuss so large a question as the introduction of prohibition within the limits of the United Kingdom. On the contrary, one of the great advantages derived from sitting together in this House was that when those who represented some portion of the United Kingdom took a novel or violent course, those from other parts brought impartial minds to bear on the subject and declared what they really believed was the right course to pursue. In the case of Wales, as in the case of Ireland, there was a large minority which had no effective representation at all, and therefore, the members of the House, as a whole, were bound to examine questions upon which Welsh and Irish opinion went further than, or even directly contrary to, British opinion. What were the opinions of hon. Members on the question of prohibition? Two days ago in the only animated debate which they had had one Member after another got up on the Government side of the House and objected to prohibition on its merits; they objected to it because it stood in the way of a more moderate and hopeful temperance reform. It was their duty to express that view in the lobby.

MR. GIBBS (Bristol, W.) said the hon. Member for the Arfon Division of Carnarvonshire had stated that a large majority of those who were convicted of drunkenness in some part of Wales were people who stepped over there from Somerset. If they stepped over into Wales, they would have to step over several miles of the Bristol Channel. He thought the hon. Member was making a mistake. He should like to know whether the hon. Member for Bath had found that those who were convicted of drunkenness in Cardiff were people from his own constituency. In regard to the question generally he thought the proposal of the Government was of the most tyrannical description. It appeared to him that they were interfering with the liberty of the people, and especially of the poorer people, who could not help themselves in this matter. This clause would not interfere in any way with people who had cellars of their own. It would interfere with those who had to earn their daily bread, and it would drive them to join drinking clubs, of which so much had been heard. The proposal was by a bare majority to allow total

 Alexander Acland-Hood and Viscount Valentia.

EARL WINTERTON moved an Amendment the effect of which was to postpone the operation of the clause to the year 1916. It seemed to him that the reasons in favour of extending the time in Wales were mainly the same as those which had been previously urged against passing the subsection as a whole. The question of putting Wales on an entirely different footing from England in the matter of local option had already been discussed; but even so he saw no reason why this proposal should come into operation at once. In the case of England it was proposed that local option should not come into operation until after fourteen years, and the Government might consider whether they would not allow the licensed trade in Wales to have some period in order to prepare for the inevitable results of prohibition there. He and his friends thought that it was a reasonable proposal which they made. The Government throughout this Bill had been only too ready to put upon the shoulders of future Governments the duty of deciding whether this or that should be carried, and, although the Opposition did not altogether agree with that attitude, as it had been adopted for England as a whole it ought to be adopted for Wales. They had a strong case inasmuch as a real hardship would ensue to the liquor trade generally in Wales if the proposal were put into operation at once. He appealed to the Government to accept the Amendment.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 5, line 26 to leave out the words 'passing of this Act,' and to insert the words 'first day of January, nineteen hundred and sixteen.'"—(Earl Winterton.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out, stand part of the Clause."

SIR S. EVANS hoped the noble Lord would not press his Amendment or call upon the Committee to discuss it in detail. He had himself not spoken at length in the previous discussion, but it must be quite obvious to the Committee that whether the opinions held on the subject were right or wrong there had been what he might almost call a passionate appeal on the part of those who represented in a special sense the Principality for a clause of this kind. It would be going entirely contrary to that appeal, so strongly made that afternoon, and also to the opinion of the majority of the Committee as expressed in the division which had just taken place, if they were to postpone the beneficent operation of this provision for the period proposed. He entirely agreed with the sentiments that had been expressed in the debate by all his colleagues, and he believed they represented the views of the vast majority of the country from which he came. It was impossible to accept the Amendment and he trusted the noble Lord would not press it to a division.

MR. AKERS-DOUGLAS said he agreed with the Solicitor-General in this respect only, that he did not think this matter would take up any considerable time of the Committee. At the same time he thought there were one or two reasons why they might differ from the views of the Solicitor-General. The hon. and learned Gentleman said that he thought the chief reason, or one of the reasons, why they should agree to this clause was on account of the passionate appeal urged on the part of those who represented Wales and the opinion which had been expressed by the division that had just taken place. That was all very well, and certainly hon. Members opposite might have given expression to a strong opinion on behalf of a majority in Wales, but in many counties it might be only a majority of one. There was, however, another side to the question, viz., the position of the minority. It would be very hard indeed on the trade and on those who had invested their money in the trade if this clause should come into effect at once, supposing the Bill passed. They ought to give these people some notice so as to prepare for so great a change. It was only reasonable that some close time should be suggested, and he thought they had a precedent for this. The hon. Member for Appleby in a Bill which he introduced some time ago suggested a period of five years which should be, so to speak, a close time, and, therefore, he thought they might have some support from him in their view that this option should not come into force at once. The Opposition held just as strong a view as the Solicitor-General on this question. The hon. and learned Gentleman talked of the passionate view of Wales which he thought ought to prevail, and that the majority ought to have the power at once. The Opposition asked, on the other hand, for some mercy, some consideration for the minority in Wales, and for those who were largely interested in these matters.

*MR. LEIF JONES said he ought to explain in answer to the right hon. Gentleman that there was no compensation in his Bill. The veto was to operate in five years without compensation. His reason for giving that notice was that under the Act of 1904 the Party opposite conferred a vested interest upon the trade, and, therefore, he thought he was bound to fix some limit.

*MR. G. D. FABER (York) said that the Solicitor-General had talked about the passionate appeal that had come from Wales on the question of local option. But the Government Front Bench had been singularly silent on the matter. He looked upon the clause rather as a strategical move on the part of the Government. He believed the clause had been put into the Bill—because there had been many cooks at work—in order that later on in another place it might be thrown out. It was a strategical move, having an eye on another place, and also in order to gratify a certain section of the Government's own supporters. Nobody who had heard the speech of the hon. Member for Carnarvonshire could have any doubt of his feeling on the matter. At the same time, when they were asked to abstain from going to a division on account of a passionate appeal, they must exercise their judgment in the matter, and he thought it would be singularly ill-advised from the point of view of the best interests of this measure, that they should have there and then, if it passed into law, local option for Wales. The very root and foundation of the Bill was the reduction scheme and the compensation fund. By passing this clause the effect would be to throw the licences in Wales that might be reduced under it, upon the compensation fund. They were going to dislocate the whole fund. But the fund had not been created for that purpose. It had been primarily created for the purpose of meeting the reductions that were to be made under Clause 1 of the Bill. They were going to promote financial chaos. They were going to make it the object of the Commission to increase the compensation levy to the highest rate possible. That would cause the greatest unfairness and hardship. It was not fair that the benefit, if any, that would result to Wales from local option should be paid for by England, and that would be the effect of the clause.

THE CHAIRMAN said that the hon. Gentleman should come nearer the point of the Amendment.

*MR. G. D. FABER said it would be unfair to bring this clause into effect there and then, and it would be better to wait until the termination of the time-limit.

THE CHAIRMAN said that that was not the Amendment, which would be some years after the end of the compensation period.

*MR. G. D. FABER said he did not agree with the noble Lord who moved the Amendment as to the exact time, but he thought he was at liberty to adduce an argument to show that if they postponed local option in Wales it was highly desirable in the interests of everybody concerned. As to the number of years, he would assimilate the period to that in the third clause of the Bill. If England was to have local option at the end of the time-limit he thought it would be only just and proper that Wales should be in the same position. It would be much fairer all round that local option for Wales, if it was brought into force, should wait until the end of the time-limit.

MR. JAMES HOPE (Sheffield, Central) said he desired to join in the protest of his hon. friend the Member for York against the view of the Solicitor-General that they should reject this Amendment because a passionate appeal had come from Wales in favour of the principle of this clause. He entirely demurred. He thought that passion was the last thing which should influence this Assembly, and they should not be influenced by passionate appeal. He might also say that in the Welsh temperament passion was more easily evoked than in that of the English people. He congratulated the hon. and learned Solicitor-General, on his self-restraint in his speech, though he feared he must always find his present position less agreeable than his former seat below the gangway, where there was no necessity for self-restraint. He rather disagreed with his noble friend and should prefer to put in the words "1933" It could fairly be argued that if they took 1923 Wales would be treated with special consideration, because then they would have agreed definitely to give prohibition there. He and his friends thought that it was a reasonable proposal which they made. The Government throughout this Bill had been only too ready to put upon the shoulders of future Governments the duty of deciding whether this or that should be carried, and, although the Opposition did not altogether agree with that attitude, as it had been adopted for England as a whole it ought to be adopted for Wales. They had a strong case inasmuch as a real hardship would ensue to the liquor trade generally in Wales if the proposal were put into operation at once. He appealed to the Government to accept the Amendment.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 5, line 26 to leave out the words 'passing of this Act,' and to insert the words 'first day of January, nineteen hundred and sixteen.'"—(Earl Winterton.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out, stand part of the Clause."

SIR S. EVANS hoped the noble Lord would not press his Amendment or call upon the Committee to discuss it in detail. He had himself not spoken at length in the previous discussion, but it must be quite obvious to the Committee that whether the opinions held on the subject were right or wrong there had been what he might almost call a passionate appeal on the part of those who represented in a special sense the Principality for a clause of this kind. It would be going entirely contrary to that appeal, so strongly made that afternoon, and also to the opinion of the majority of the Committee as expressed in the division which had just taken place, if they were to postpone the beneficent operation of this provision for the period proposed. He entirely agreed with the sentiments that had been expressed in the debate by all his colleagues, and he believed they represented the views of the vast majority of the country from which he came. It was impossible to accept the Amendment and he trusted the noble Lord would not press it to a division.

MR. AKERS-DOUGLAS said he agreed with the Solicitor-General in this respect only, that he did not think this matter would take up any considerable time of the Committee. At the same time he thought there were one or two reasons why they might differ from the views of the Solicitor-General. The hon. and learned Gentleman said that he thought the chief reason, or one of the reasons, why they should agree to this clause was on account of the passionate appeal urged on the part of those who represented Wales and the opinion which had been expressed by the division that had just taken place. That was all very well, and certainly hon. Members opposite might have given expression to a strong opinion on behalf of a majority in Wales, but in many counties it might be only a majority of one. There was, however, another side to the question, viz., the position of the minority. It would be very hard indeed on the trade and on those who had invested their money in the trade if this clause should come into effect at once, supposing the Bill passed. They ought to give these people some notice so as to prepare for so great a change. It was only reasonable that some close time should be suggested, and he thought they had a precedent for this. The hon. Member for Appleby in a Bill which he introduced some time ago suggested a period of five years which should be, so to speak, a close time, and, therefore, he thought they might have some support from him in their view that this option should not come into force at once. The Opposition held just as strong a view as the Solicitor-General on this question. The hon. and learned Gentleman talked of the passionate view of Wales which he thought ought to prevail, and that the majority ought to have the power at once. The Opposition asked, on the other hand, for some mercy, some consideration for the minority in Wales, and for those who were largely interested in these matters.

*MR. LEIF JONES said he ought to explain in answer to the right hon. Gentleman that there was no compensation in his Bill. The veto was to operate in five years without compensation. His reason for giving that notice was that under the Act of 1904 the Party opposite conferred a vested interest upon the trade, and, therefore, he thought he was bound to fix some limit.

*MR. G. D. FABER (York) said that the Solicitor-General had talked about the passionate appeal that had come from Wales on the question of local option. But the Government Front Bench had been singularly silent on the matter. He looked upon the clause rather as a strategical move on the part of the Government. He believed the clause had been put into the Bill—because there had been many cooks at work—in order that later on in another place it might be thrown out. It was a strategical move, having an eye on another place, and also in order to gratify a certain section of the Government's own supporters. Nobody who had heard the speech of the hon. Member for Carnarvonshire could have any doubt of his feeling on the matter. At the same time, when they were asked to abstain from going to a division on account of a passionate appeal, they must exercise their judgment in the matter, and he thought it would be singularly ill-advised from the point of view of the best interests of this measure, that they should have there and then, if it passed into law, local option for Wales. The very root and foundation of the Bill was the reduction scheme and the compensation fund. By passing this clause the effect would be to throw the licenses in Wales that might be reduced under it, upon the compensation fund. They were going to dislocate the whole fund. But the fund had not been created for that purpose. It had been primarily created for the purpose of meeting the reductions that were to be made under Clause 1 of the Bill. They were going to promote financial chaos. They were going to make it the object of the Commission to increase the compensation levy to the highest rate possible.. That would cause the greatest unfairness and hardship. It was not fair that the benefit, if any, that would result to Wales from local option should be paid for by England, and that would be the effect of the clause.

THE CHAIRMAN said that the hon. Gentleman should come nearer the point of the Amendment.

*MR. G. D. FABER said it would be unfair to bring this clause into effect there and then, and it would be better to wait until the termination of the time-limit.

THE CHAIRMAN said that that was not the Amendment, which would be some years after the end of the compensation period.

*MR. G. D. FABER said he did not agree with the noble Lord who moved the Amendment as to the exact time, but he thought he was at liberty to adduce an argument to show that if they postponed local option in Wales it was highly desirable in the interests of everybody concerned. As to the number of years, he would assimilate the period to that in the third clause of the Bill. If England was to have local option at the end of the time-limit he thought it would be only just and proper that Wales should be in the same position. It would be much fairer all round that local option for Wales, if it was brought into force, should wait until the end of the time-limit.

MR. JAMES HOPE (Sheffield, Central) said he desired to join in the protest of his hon. friend the Member for York against the view of the Solicitor-General that they should reject this Amendment because a passionate appeal had come from Wales in favour of the principle of this clause. He entirely demurred. He thought that passion was the last thing which should influence this Assembly, and they should not be influenced by passionate appeal. He might also say that in the Welsh temperament passion was more easily evoked than in that of the English people. He congratulated the hon. and learned Solicitor-General, on his self-restraint in his speech, though he feared he must always find his present position less agreeable than his former seat below the gangway, where there was no necessity for self-restraint. He rather disagreed with his noble friend and should prefer to put in the words "1923." It could fairly be argued that if they took 1923 Wales would be treated with special consideration, because then they would have agreed definitely to give the Principality this power, whereas with regard to England they only indicated in a very vague way that they might on some future occasion obtain it. In that case they would be dealing very specially with Wales in order to meet the passionate demand made upon them. It might be objected that, after all, the great point was that Wales should immediately get these special powers, and that whereas a probationary period of fourteen years was necessary in the case of England, in connection with Wales a very much shorter period would be necessary. On the whole, he was not disposed to quarrel with and move an Amendment to his noble friend's proposal, because he had made some concession to Welsh sentiment, but he did most earnestly appeal that the provision as to seven years should be made. He wished to call attention to a very serious thing which was going to happen next year under the combined effect of this clause and the first clause. The first clause said that the licensing justices should prepare a scheme of reduction, but in Wales there was to be granted a power of local option, and he asked what, if this clause came into operation at the date of the passing of the Act, the position of the justices would be? It would be really an intolerable position. They would first of all have to meet and try to make up their minds as to the scheme of reduction, and how it was to be carried out, but while they were doing this they would be in the greatest uncertainty as to what the parochial electors in all the parishes would be about. It would be impossible to frame their scheme of reduction, because all the time they might know that the local electors would be setting on foot other plans, and they could not make any recommendations to the Licensing Commission until they knew the result of all these local elections. They might make their recommendations on a scale which would involve a certain liability on the Compensation Fund. But supposing they ignored this provision as to local option and went ahead without preparing their scheme, made all their calculations as to the number of years, and all the rest, and sent it to the Commission? In the meantime, after they had taken all this trouble, the passionate electors of certain parishes or districts might set on foot their requisition for local option. They were not bound to do it at once; they might do it at any time within the year; and not till months had passed would it be possible for the justices to know how far their original proposals would be modified, and necessarily modified, by the result of the local option polls. This was, he said, putting the licensing justices in Wales into even a worse position than they would be in England, because all their time, labour, and trouble might be vitiated by these subsequent local polls. On that account he earnestly entreated the Government, if it was only for three years, to defer the operation of this local option provision until they saw how the magistrates were able to work the Act under the powers as to statutory reduction in Clause 1. But if the provision was difficult financially for the justices, it would become intolerable for the Licensing Commission. He had no sympathy with the Licensing Commission. He had read a speech by a member of the present Government saying that if anything particularly indefensible was contemplated the usual method of dealing was to get three lawyers to carry it out. Therefore, he was not greatly in love with the Licensing Commission, but he would like to see them have a fair chance once they began; and they would not have a fair chance, because they would have to consider all these competing schemes for reduction. They would have to consider the schemes for statutory reduction by the justices, and then on top of that would come further modifications of those schemes under subhead (a) subsection (2), of this clause, and the same under subhead (b) and the amount of congestion of work would be almost intolerable for them. He could not see, under these circumstances, that they could possibly frame a yearly budget, because all their calculations might be upset by some few parishes, who were somewhat late in proceeding to take advantage of the local option proposal in Wales. They might consider all the schemes of the justices, and their financial aspects, and then on top of their work would come certain belated decisions as to local option, which would upset all their calculations. That was not a proud position in which to place the Licensing Commission. The Government must see the difficulty, and he was rather sorry that there was no Cabinet Minister present, though they had been rejoiced to see the First Lord of the Admiralty, who took part in the debate that afternoon, and to know that his other duties did not prevent him from doing so. He would ask the hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill to give a suspensory reply on this question, and not to give a non possumus to the very reasonable request his noble friend had made.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS (Birmingham, Bordesley) said his hon. friend behind him had said that this proposal was not fair: but there was nothing fair within the four corners of the Bill. The Solicitor-General in his speech illustrated the tyrannous character of the position which the Government had taken, not only with regard to this but with regard to almost every other proposal that was made. The hon. and learned Gentleman had given as what he called his chief reason not the principle, but the passionate desire for the provision by what he called the people of Wales.

SIR S. EVANS pointed out that all he had said was that such a proposal went to postpone the system for seven years.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS replied that the Solicitor-General said that his chief reason was pressure of opinion. What about the passionate appeal of what might be forty-nine people out of every 100?

*THE DEPUTY-CHAIRMAN (Mr. CALDWELL, Lanarkshire, Mid.) said that the expediency of the further reduction had been decided under the Amendment to omit subsection (1). The only question now was the date at which the proposal was to come into operation. By the Bill it was to be the date of the passing of the Act and by the Amendment seven years later.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS said he agreed. He was alluding to the reason given by the Solicitor-General why the Government could not assent to the postponement, and the chief reason was the passionate appeal made to them, which might be that of perhaps fifty-one out of 100 people in a locality. Those who supported the Bill had no great sympathy with the minority, and to his mind one great reason why this suggestion should be assented to was that it would put off the time for seven years at least when the process of prohibition might be entered upon, and secret drinking, home drinking, and the formation of clubs which must inevitably follow on prohibition would take place. They thought those changes might well be postponed for seven years. The Government had made up their minds and they had got the majority behind them to carry out their wishes. But there was no enthusiasm whatever in the opposition to this Amendment; it was only an arbitrary decision. [AN HON. MEMBER: Tyranny.] Yes, tyranny, and a disregard of the minority which was illustrative of the position of the Government in this matter.

MR. REMNANT (Finsbury, Holborn) said he would not have risen to take part in the debate but for the fact that the Amendment, which he heartily supported, was calculated to meet the desires which had been expressed by a good many members of the Welsh party. He extremely regretted that the large amount of enthusiasm which was shown for local option in Wales in the earlier part of the debate had so suddenly evaporated, and that they were reduced to the spectacle of two Welsh Members on the benches opposite. It was a striking illustration of the enthusiasm of Welsh Members, especially when this clause affected them so very closely. The Amendment seemed to him to offer these enthusiastic Welsh Members an opportunity which they had been crying for. It had been declared in no measured tones in the debate that for many years past Wales had been hoping for the opportunity to do away with licensed houses throughout the Principality. It seemed to him that if they extended the period they might have an opportunity

TELLERS FOR THE NOES—Mr.
 George D. Faber and Mr.
 Lane-Fox.

SIR S. EVANS said he was glad to be able to adopt an Amendment which had been put on the Paper by an hon. Member opposite. It proposed to insert after "carried," the words "in any rural parish or urban area," and as its effect would be to reduce the size of the area in which local option was to be exercised in Wales, it would bring this clause, so far as areas and districts were concerned, into harmony with Clauses 1 and 2. He begged to move.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 5, line 29, after the words 'carried in,' to insert the words 'any rural parish or urban area.'"—(Sir Samuel Evans.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. CAVE thought that the hon. and learned Gentleman knew that the Opposition were strongly opposed to this Amendment for the same reason that they were opposed to a former Amendment on which this was consequential. He had always felt strongly that if local veto was imposed it ought only to be in large areas where there was no bias and where an honest vote was obtained.

Question put.

MR. LUTTRELL (Devonshire, Tavistock) said the Amendment he was about to move was to leave out the words “in Wales (including the county of Monmouth),” so as to give England the same benefit as the Act would confer upon Wales.

MR. JAMES HOPE submitted that the Amendment was out of order, because under Clause 3 it had been decided that local option should be extended in such manner as Parliament might determine at the termination of the reduction period. This clause made a special reduction in the case of Wales, but to accept the Amendment would nullify and stultify the effect of what was carried on Monday by enacting that before the termination of the reduction period local option should generally prevail.

*THE DEPUTY-CHAIRMAN said that Clause 3, referred to by the hon. Member, had reference to local option which was to come into effect on the termination of the reduction period, in both England and Wales. The Clause (9) presently before the Committee had reference to a further reduction extending the statutory reduction, and was to have effect after the passing of this Act. The principle of this further reduction was affirmed by the decision to omit subsection 1. The effect of the Amendment to be proposed by the hon. Member (Mr. Luttrell), to leave out “in Wales (including the county of Monmouth),” if carried would be to extend this power of further reduction to the whole of England and Wales, which was quite in order.

*MR. LUTTRELL said he was asking the Committee whether they would extend the same benefit to England as they were proposing to extend to Wales. After all, statutory powers were to a certain extent arbitrary. [“Hear, hear.”] Hon. Members opposite cheered that. They contended that they were arbitrary in the sense that they might go too far ; but if they admitted that, they must also admit that they might be arbitrary in not going far enough. He held that it was quite possible that the statutory power might not give expression to the views of the people in the locality. Whatever they were they were not a parish body, and the object of the Bill was to give to parishioners an opportunity of settling what the number of houses in their locality should be. The statutory reduction was an expression of their opinion in the House of Commons and not that of the parishioners. They gave Wales an advantage; why not give the same advantage to England? He could not see why there should be any distinction drawn. It might be said that Wales was in advance of England, but there were many parts of England which were quite as advanced as Wales in the direction of temperance reform. Cornwall was, he believed, solid in favour of local option, and there were many districts of England which were also strongly in favour of extreme temperance reform and which he was convinced would not feel they were being fairly dealt with if advantages were given to Wales over them. He only pleaded that there should be local option. If there was a district which expressed an opinion that the statutory reduction was not sufficient it should have the opportunity of altering it to a certain extent. He did not think that request could be looked upon as unreasonable, nor did he see why the gallantry of Wales should be rewarded over the gallantry of Cornwall and other parts of England.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 5, lines 29 and 30, to leave out the words 'in Wales (including the County of Monmouth).'"—(Mr. Luttrell.) Question proposed, "That the words 'in Wales' stand part of the Clause."

SIR S. EVANS said he was afraid they could not accept the Amendment. He recommended his hon. friend to use his powers of persuasion in converting England to the same view as Wales held in the matter. Immediately it appeared that the whole representation of England was in favour of this principle he had no doubt it would be granted. Until that time it was quite obvious that England was not ripe for such a change. The hon. Member said Cornwall was in favour of it, but the reason was obvious. Cornwall was part of Wales. The only portion of England to which they could apply this provision was the county of Monmouth, which was taken away from them by their own King Henry VIII.

*MR. DUNN (Cornwall, Camborne) appealed to the mover to limit the application of the Amendment to Cornwall. If that were done might he appeal to the Solicitor-General to accept the Amendment in that form? The strongest argument he could use in favour of such a course was to adopt that which had fallen from the Solicitor-General a moment ago to the effect that if the whole representation of a district were in favour of such a proposal it should be permitted. Cornish Members were unanimous in this request. They must remember after all that Cornwall was not England. In Cornwall the people still spoke of going into England, and when visitors came to them across the Tamar they still referred to them as foreigners. And, after all, the geographical divisions that divided Cornwall from Devonshire were even more marked than those dividing Monmouthshire from the adjoining districts, and as they were dealing with differential legislation this was important. Seeing that Cornwall was ripe to receive this power and desired it, and that, taking Cornwall as a whole, they were already within the statutory limit, he would appeal most earnestly to the mover to allow the people of Cornwall to go one better than England, and be enabled to do what their Celtic brothers were entitled to do under the provisions of the section.

*MR. CAVE said it appeared to him that the mover of the Amendment was entirely logical in what he had said, and so was the hon. Gentleman who had just spoken. If the measure was good for Wales it was equally good for England or for any part of England, and if separate treatment was to be applied to Wales, why not to other parts of the Kingdom which desired it? He was not in favour of the Amendment, because he was not in favour of the clause, but the position of the hon. Member who moved the Amendment was more logical than that of the Solicitor-General.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. LANE-FOX (Yorkshire, W.R., Arkston Ash) moved to omit the words "including the county of Monmouth." They had been told that one unanswerable reason why this treatment should be accorded to Wales was that there was solid representation of Members in favour of the change. To be logical they must extend that even further, and say that because Monmouthshire had been misguided enough to send a representation entirely united in their desire to support the present Liberal Government, they were, therefore, uniform in support of the principle of this Bill, a principle which, if once applied to the counties of England must be carried a great deal further. He came from the West Riding of Yorkshire—one of the few Unionist Members. He was sure that West Riding would not wish to have these provisions applied to them. If the Government endeavoured so to apply them, one result would certainly be seen in the next Parliament. There would be very few Liberal representatives from that part of the country. From the political point of view, he was not sure that he should not wish to recommend that point to the House. But there were a great many reasons why they should hesitate before they adopted the suggestion contained in these words. If once they began to apply these conditions to England, there was no knowing where they would stop. The figures of convictions for drunkenness which had been hurled from one side to the other were undoubtedly difficult to put together. They had had figures from the two sides of the House which did not altogether agree, but they could not get away from the fact that there had been an increasing number of convictions for drunkenness in some counties and a decrease in others. They all admired the sincerity of the remarkable speech which they heard earlier in the evening, and no one denied that there was a feeling in Wales on this question which did not exist in English constituencies. The Solicitor-General was very fond of raising precedents, and he had referred to the precedent of Henry VIII. He thought that was going back rather a long distance. To argue that because Monmouth belonged to Wales and not to England in the time of Henry VIII. they should now restore it, was using a very remarkable argument. The convictions for drunkenness in the county of Monmouth about a quarter of a century ago were 734 per 100,000; and they had fallen in 1905 to 549. In Glamorganshire the figures had risen from 771 per 100,000 to 1,161 in 1905. It was for the Government to give reasons why this clause should apply to Monmouth as well as to Wales—reasons which would controvert these figures. Welshmen would make an excellent bargain because they were to get a great moral impetus at the expense of Englishmen. It seemed to him a gross libel upon the moral condition of the people that they should imply that this great moral regeneration was necessary. They found by the convictions that there had been a steady improvement in drunkenness in Monmouth as had been the case all over England. There were signs of a great improvement in all sections of the community, and before they could contend that Monmouth should be included the Government ought to prove that there was special reason for taking that step apart from the other counties of England. He had much pleasure in moving his Amendment.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 5, lines 29 and 30, to leave out the words 'including the County of Monmouth.'"— (Mr. Lane-Fox.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the clause."

SIR IVOR HERBERT (Monmouthshire, S.) said he had experienced a slight shock whilst listening to the moral views put forward by the hon. Member opposite. The hon. Member admitted that Monmouthshire was improperly taken away from Wales, and because restitution had been delayed for centuries he contended that it ought not to be restored at all. That was not the moral tone which they adopted in the Principality. If an illegal act had been committed—inclusion of Monmouthshire in the Principality. One reason suggested by the hon. and gallant Member why Monmouth should be included was that the people of the county were absolutely keen for temperance reform. If the whole of the population of the county were so keen, he wondered why they got drunk so much, for it was remarkable that, as compared with the adjoining counties, there was a large number of convictions for drunkenness. He did not wish to press that point. The mere fact that there were so many convictions for drunkenness in that county might be used as an argument why it should receive the same treatment as Wales. He did not think that the hon. and gallant Gentleman's argument of the extreme desire for temperance on the part of the inhabitants of Monmouthshire could be used as a reason for including the county in the Principality. The most extraordinary point had been made that Monmouthshire was once a part of Wales, until the reign of Henry VIII. They might just as well argue that they were to apply local option to Canada or the States of America, for they belonged to this country far more recently than Monmouthshire belonged to Wales. When they were discussing the proposal to delete subsection (1), the Solicitor-General made a great point of the Welsh Sunday Closing Act. Surely the argument he used then was fatal to the argument now to include Monmouthshire, for it was then excluded. It always had been excluded. Surely the fact of this kind of legislation having been passed on more than one occasion for Wales, always excluding Monmouthshire, was fatal to the argument of including it now. He would like to draw attention to the wording of the section. As it stood now it was—

MR. LANE-FOX said he never asserted that an illegal act had been committed.

But Wales did not include the county of Monmouth, and how could they allow a section to go on the Statute-book with words like that? He would like to ask the Chairman's decision on the point. He doubted whether it was within their power in this form to bring Monmouthshire within this section. For all those reasons he strongly supported the leaving out of the county of Monmouth from the clause. He should raise the point again whether it was possible to achieve the object of the Government by the use of the form of words in the clause.

*MR. REES said that without discussing the merits of Clause 9 he would insist that if it was passed it must include the county of Monmouth. The hon. Gentleman opposite acknowledged that Monmouth was once part of Wales, but he said that that was no argument for its remaining a part of Wales. That showed a complete ignorance of the Welsh character, which was always to hold on to anything that it once had. He could assure the hon. Member that Wales did not mean to let go the county of Monmouth. The hon. Gentleman said that Monmouth was not part of Wales because in Acts of Parliament Monmouth was always referred to separately from Wales, but that only meant that that part of Wales alone deserved, and required specific mention. There were other parts of Wales for which the argument which had been used might be more fairly put forward. For instance, in his own county of Montgomeryshire they would not part with one town, village, or family; although ethnologically one-half of the county, it might be argued, was not Welsh but English. They were Church people, Conservatives, and everything that was English. Did the hon. Member imagine that they would on that account part with one man, woman, or child? How much more was it to ease with Monmouthshire, where, as a point of fact, Welsh was more spoken than in the neighbouring county of Glamorgan or in half the county of subject of temperance reform was added to the other great national questions a wave of feeling spread over the country that produced the result of which he was a feeble exponent in this House. It was said that the condition of the people should be improved by giving them better dwellings instead of merely shutting up public-houses, but he would ask the Committee to look at the condition of things that existed in his part of the county, the part most English—the part adjacent to the boundary of Gloucestershire. In the two petty sessional divisions near that frontier the condition of things was perfectly appalling. In one division there were no fewer than 51 licensed houses, making the proportion of one to every 100 inhabitants, and the other, that of Chepstow, there were 65, or one to 149 inhabitants. Surely no hon. Member opposite would say it was reasonable for every 100 inhabitants to have their own particular public-house. Nor could their joy be increased by such an excessive number of places of entertainment. The truth was that Welshmen wished in this matter to move a little more rapidly than the Opposition desired. They wanted to get out of a condition of things which had arisen owing to the history of that particular part of the country. That region was at no very distant period the domain of a great nobleman who never lived there and never looked upon the property as anything more than a place to derive rents from and exercise political power over. In one half-mile of this district there were thirteen public-houses. He had often passed them and counted them again and again. A vast amount of evidence was laid before the Licensing Commission, showing the desirability of treating Monmouthshire on account of its geographical and industrial position on precisely the same basis as the neighbouring county of Glamorgan. For administrative reasons it would be very much easier and would make very much more certain the correct application of the law. In this matter sentiment could not altogether be dismissed. Monmouthshire was Welsh in its language, beliefs, and ideals, and to separate the two on a question so close to the heart of the people of the neighbourhood as temperance reform would be an act that that House should not really sanction.

MR. COURTHOPE (Sussex, Rye) said the hon. and gallant Member opposite had stated one or two reasons why he thought Monmouthshire should be treated as part of Wales. One of the points he made was in regard to the number of public-houses there. It was stated that in one district there was 1 to the 100 of population, and in another 1 to 149. These figures were not borne out by the official Returns.

SIR IVOR HERBERT said the official Returns were not brought up to the day before yesterday, as his information was.

MR. COURTHOPE said that if the official Returns for 1907 were correct, and if the hon. and gallant Member's figures were correct, then all he could say was that the justices of Monmouthshire must have granted a great many new licences during the past year. The official figures showed that in one of the petty sessions districts referred to by the hon. Member the proportion of licensed houses was 39·43 per 10,000 of the population; in Newport 24 per 10,000 of the population, and in the only district where the figure was large the proportion was 105 per 10,000 of the population, so that the argument of the hon. Member fell to the ground. For the sake of argument he would assume that the hon. Gentleman's information was correct. If that was so, all the more rapid and greater would be the decrease of licences under Clause 1 of the Bill, and therefore, he did not think that the hon. and gallant Member could found on that an argument for the England only received a miserable one. But those were never counties, and he defied any hon. Member to prove that they ever did form counties of England or Wales before. If they referred to the statute it was pretty clear that Monmouthshire was included among the counties of England and the other counties were added to the Principality. So far as historical truth was concerned, there was no truth whatever in the statement that Monmouthshire formed part of Wales. As to the guide of language, he was not sure about the last census, but the census before that showed that in one place the number of the population who declared that they were monoglot Welshmen was four, while the number of monoglot Englishmen was seventy-nine, and it was not quite clear whether Monmouthshire spoke Welsh or English. As to precedents one was a temperance measure and the other was not. The temperance measure expressly excluded Monmouthshire, and was confined to the counties of the Principality. When, therefore, they were dealing with a temperance measure which was the matured opinion of the Liberal Government in 1881, and he assumed they were right in forming their judgment—perhaps more right than they were now—it was treated as English. Except perhaps for the majorities on this question, he could not see why they should sever the Principality of Wales from the rest of England in this manner any more than any other localities. There were majorities in favour of dealing more drastically with the temperance question in other parts of England, but the Government was not likely to yield to them. He did not think they should carry out what was an unfortunate precedent on the part of the Conservative Government in the Education Act. He, therefore, should vote against the proposal.

SIR S. EVANS was understood to say that it was part and parcel of the Government plan to include Monmouthshire with the rest of Wales, to which it was attached and to which it properly belonged. The hon. Member who had just sat down had referred to the Act of Henry VIII., but undoubtedly under that Act Monmouthshire was not a county at all. As a matter of fact at that time, and up to that time, the area now covered by the County of Monmouth consisted of several marches, and the marches were not five along the West parts of Wales, as the hon. Member had said, but 150.

MR. LAURENCE HARDY said he had only stated that they were divided into five.

SIR S. EVANS said there were 150, and 24 of these marches were taken to form the County of Monmouthshire. That was done under the Act of Union between England and Wales. It was a significant fact that Monmouthshire should be constituted English under the Act of Parliament which provided for the Union. For sometime previous Monmouthshire had not any representative in Parliament. Until the time of Henry VIII. they never sent one and it was intended amongst other things under that Act that certain representatives should be allotted to various counties in the Principality, and Monmouthshire was treated just as the other counties. The tendency of recent years had invariably been to connect Monmouth with Wales for all purposes, and the people in Monmouthshire regarded themselves as part and parcel of the Principality. He would not refer again to the precedents, but it was a curious thing that in an Act of Parliament which had been referred to Monmouthshire came right in the middle of the shires. However that might be, the tendency of modern legislation had been to connect Monmouthshire with Wales, and it was intended so to clude Monmouthshire in the licensing Bill. It was intended to include that county in the Disestablishment measure which was produced in this House thirteen fourteen years ago, because the whole of Monmouthshire was in the diocese of Llandaff. Therefore, for episcopal, ethnographical, geographical, historical, practical, and political reasons Monmouth should be included with Wales.

MR. WYNDHAM said he had listened with the greatest interest to the last defence of the Ministry of what they were asked to believe was temperance reform. They had had abundant time to say that local veto or prohibition was the best of all forms of temperance legislation, or that even it was a temperance reform at all. The Government had been well-advised to abandon that defence because when they were discussing this question the day before yesterday he thought, with the single exception of the hon. Member for Appleby, not one of their supporters was prepared to say that it was that kind of temperance reform that he advocated. The defence put forward for this so-called temperance reform was concentrated by the Solicitor-General into a historical disquisition which an hon. friend assured him did not come up to the standard of historical accuracy of which the hon. and learned Gentleman was a recognised custodian. They had been assisting, in a debate on temperance reform, to enact within the small arena of our domestic frontier a parallel to the great drama which had recently been enacted in the Far East. They were engaged, or at least the Government were engaged, in a rectification of frontier. They were not discussing temperance reform, but what in the language of diplomacy was called "the peaceful penetration of England." But why should this so-called temperance Bill be made the means of annexing to Wales part of England? If there was to be this infraction of territory, at least let it be done deliberately and with some regard to treaties in the past. He did not think it would do to make a debate in favour of temperance reform the occasion for altering the map of Great Britain. If hon. Members who supported the Government believed that local veto was a temperance reform, and the best kind of temperance reform, then he could understand their position; but nobody had ever said or attempted to show that it was a great blessing, and casting aside all this historical, political, and romantic disquisition upon the patriotism of Wales let them preserve this bit of England, which was a piece of England de jure, from being brought under what they believed to be not a blessing but a curse.

*MR. BRIDGEMAN (Shropshire, Oswestry) said that as representing a border constituency he felt a little anxious about any question of the line of the boundaries between England and Wales. Although he had never observed that the Government had shown any intention to extend it to the county in which he lived, he felt that a very bad precedent would be created if he were to vote for including in Wales any county bordering the Principality. He was not interested in the historical or ethnological argument of the Solicitor-General. The speech the Committee ought to turn to was that of the hon. and gallant Member for Monmouth, which, the hon. Gentleman said, represented the feeling of the country. He had introduced a new mandate and told the Committee that he won his seat on local option in Monmouth.

SIR IVOR HERBERT said, not local option. His point was that what made his seat quite safe was the adoption of the right hon. Gentleman opposite, the then head of the Government, of the views of the trade on the licensing question.

*MR. BRIDGEMAN expressed the hope that on the next occasion the hon.

Gentleman would be able and would be careful to attribute the result of the election to the same cause. His speech was quite unlike that of any Welsh Member supporting this principle. They supported the principle on the ground that Wales was in favour of and entitled to exceptional treatment, because of the saintliness of the Welsh people; but the hon. and gallant Gentleman advocated that it should be extended to Monmouthshire on the ground that Monmouthshire was a bad county and had a great many public-houses. It was not on the ground that Monmouth was a good place and had so reduced the number of licences that they must have local option extended to them in order to effect further reductions, but that Monmouth was so bad that it would be good to include it in the Welsh scheme. Such an argument as that would apply equally well to Scotland and Ireland. He hoped the hon. Gentleman would include them with Monmouth and advocate this principle for the whole country.

*MR. R. DUNCAN (Lanarkshire, Govan) thought that the speeches to which the Committee had listened from hon. Gentlemen opposite were very fair representations of the swallowing capacity of Wales. They had heard a great deal of her swallowing power. She was now apparently bent on swallowing a small sprat in Monmouth, and would go on swallowing until she had swallowed England, Scotland, and Ireland. That was but a commencement. One step followed another: a hot Catholic drew out a strong Orangeman—the vigour of one drew out the vigour of the other. Fanatics begat fanatics. Welshmen, they knew, drank strong waters, and he admitted that Scotsmen drank far too much; but because Scotsmen drank too much, were they to force Englishmen to drink nothing? He had read and he had heard the words preached from the pulpit, that we should be temperate in all things, but he had never read that there should be total abstinence from all things, whether wine, women, or song. Where would the coming generations be if we were to abstain totally from these humanities? This proposal was an attempt on the part of Wales to spread the system of total abstinence, and he protested against it. England would become prohibitionist, Scotland would become prohibitionist, and poor Ireland, considerably dependent for her prosperity on her poteen and her Guinness, would have to become a total abstainer.

Question put.

TELLERS FOR THE NOES—Mr.
Lane-Fox and Mr. George D. Faber.

And, it being after half-past Ten of the clock, the CHAIRMAN proceeded, pursuant to the Order of the House of 17th July, to put forthwith the Question on the Amendments proposed by the Government of which Notice had been given.

Amendments made—

“In page 5, line 30, to leave out the word ‘section,’ and to insert the word ‘Act.’”—
(Sir Samuel Evans.)

“In page 5, line 31, after the word ‘shall,’ to insert the words ‘within such time as the Licensing Commission may fix.’”—(Sir Samuel Evans.)

The CHAIRMAN then proceeded to put forthwith the Question necessary to dispose of the Business to be concluded at this day's sitting.

Question put, “That the Clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill.”

The Committee divided:—Ayes, 372;
Noes, 104. (Division List No. 288.)

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS CIRCULATED WITH THE VOTES.

Fees for Supplying Birth Certificates.

MR. SUMMERBELL (Sunderland): To ask the President of the Local

VOL. CXCIV. [FOURTH SERIES.]

Government Board, whether he is aware of the charges now being made, amounting in many cases to the sum of 3s. 7d., for the supply of birth certificates and search for same to applicants for old age pensions; and whether he is prepared to take steps to have such charges reduced, considering the means of the applicants.

(Answered by Mr. John Burns.) I have no power to reduce the statutory fees for supplying birth certificates, but I may say that arrangements were some time since made under which any claimant for an old age pension whose birth was registered in England or Wales since 1st July 1837, and who can give the place and date of birth, need not go to the expense of purchasing a birth certificate, and the pension officer can verify the particulars without expense to the claimant.

New Post Office in Newgate Street—Building Contract and the Fair Wages Clause.

MR. W. T. WILSON (Lancashire, Westhoughton): To ask the First Commissioner of Works, if he can state whether the contractors for the new post office in Newgate Street, E.C., are paying the standard rate of wage to the labourers and scaffolders, viz. 7d. and 7½d. per hour; whether the other workmen engaged in the various trades on that job are paid the standard rate; and, if not, will he cause inquiries to be made with the object of ascertaining whether the Fair Wages Clause is being observed.

(Answered by Mr. Harcourt.) Inquiry has been made, and the Answers to the first two Questions are in the affirmative, as regards competent workmen. Out of 442 on the books on the 21st instant I am advised that sixty-one do not come within the category. These are distributed as follows:—

Smiths: 12 boys and youths at wages from 4½d. to 5½d. making stirrups and links, that is, cutting off and bending hoop iron and wire.

Labourers: 15. Old men, boys, clerks, etc., employed in picking up firewood, waiting on carpenters, and doing odd things, wages 5d. to 6½d.

Carpenters: 11 improvers 7½d. to 9d.

Mess room boys: 4 at 4½d.

Hackers: 19. All boys, fifteen to seventeen years of age, wages 3d. to 3½d.

Probably the same amount of work could be done with less than half the number of labourers and possibly with economy to the builders, but on the other hand the above are good enough for the work they have to do, and if discharged they would find it difficult to obtain employment. By employing them on work which does not demand even skilled labourers, the builders are probably doing the greatest good to the greatest number. The carpenters' improvers seem to be really necessary. If the number of carpenters is to be maintained there must be an opportunity to learn the business. The hackers are boys who hack the concrete walls and ceilings to form a key for the plastering.

Discharge of Office of Works Employees.

MR. W. T. WILSON: To ask the First Commissioner of Works, whether he is aware that workmen are being discharged from the Works Department at the Law Courts and Somerset House, although there is a considerable amount of work in hand, on the ground that the money voted for the work is exhausted; and whether, in view of the number of unemployed workmen, he can see his way to approach the Treasury to secure a further grant so that the work in hand may be completed, and at the same time find employment for more men.

(Answered by Mr. Harcourt.) In regard to the Law Courts, works of alteration and also of general overhaul and repair, such as painting, etc., can only be carried out during the vacation when the building is unoccupied. An accumulation of work has, therefore, to be done within a comparatively short time, and more men are necessarily employed for that time than can be retained during the rest of the year. The new staircase is still in course of erection, and the extension of the Courts, which will be commenced immediately, will give employment to a number of men. In regard to Somerset House, the external painting has been completed recently; it is work which can only be done during good weather. No works at either building have been suspended for want of funds; the only works for which the money voted is exhausted are the works which have been completed. At both buildings a considerable number of men are engaged upon the ordinary maintenance work which continues throughout the year.

Taxes in England and Ireland.

MR. BELLAIRS (Lynn Regis): To ask the Secretary to the Treasury what taxes are levied in England and not in Ireland; and what taxes are levied in England and Ireland on different scales, stating the amount of the difference.

(Answered by Mr. Hobhouse.) Imperial Taxes levied in England and not in Ireland:—

Excise licence duties:

Makers or vendors of patent medicines.

Spirits dealers, additional licence to retail spirits, off.

Beer retailers, off.

Cider retailers, on or off.

Dogs.

Male servants.

Carriages.

Armorial bearings.

Railway passenger duty.

Death duties:

Legacy duty, bequests to charities.

Stamp duties:

Marriage licences (not special).

Patent medicines.

Apprenticeship, instrument of, premium or consideration not exceeding £10.

Land Tax.

Inhabited house duty.

Imperial Taxes levied in England and Ireland on different scales.

	England.	Ireland.
	£	£
Excise Licences:
Gamekeepers (in Great Britain gamekeepers are also chargeable as male servants) -	2	3
Stamp duties:
Faculty, licence, commission, or dispensation for admitting or authorising any person to act as a notary public -	30	20
Faculty or dispensation of any other kind -	30	35

Tenure of Office of Admirals.

MR. STAVELEY-HILL (Staffordshire, Kingswinford): To ask the First Lord of the Admiralty for how long Admiral of the Fleet Sir Arthur Wilson occupied his post as Commander-in-Chief of the Channel Fleet.

(Answered by Mr. McKenna.) Sir Arthur Wilson was appointed Commander-in-Chief of the Home Fleet from 21st May, 1903. This Fleet was renamed the Channel Fleet on 1st January, 1905, and Sir Arthur Wilson continued to hold the command of it until 4th March, 1907.

MR. STAVELEY-HILL: To ask the First Lord of the Admiralty for how long Admiral of the Fleet Lord Walter Kerr occupied the post of First Sea Lord, and for how long after his special promotion he continued in office.

(Answered by Mr. McKenna.) Admiral of the Fleet Lord Walter Kerr occupied the post of First Sea Lord for five years and two months, having been appointed on 14th August, 1899, and ceased duty on 20th October, 1904. He continued as First Sea Lord for four months after being promoted to Admiral of the Fleet.

MR. STAVELEY-HILL: To ask the First Lord of the Admiralty for how long Admiral Lord Charles Beresford has occupied his present post as Commander-in-Chief of the Channel Fleet; and whether the appointment of a new Commander-in-Chief, which has been announced to take effect after next March, was in any way authorised by the Admiralty.

(Answered by Mr. McKenna.) Lord Charles Beresford has held the command of the Channel Fleet for more than nineteen months. The Admiralty have not made any appointment of a new Commander-in-Chief.

MR. STAVELEY-HILL: To ask the First Lord of the Admiralty how long Admiral of the Fleet Sir John Fisher has occupied his post as First Sea Lord, and how long it is since the date of his special promotion to Admiral of the Fleet in order to prevent his retirement under the age clause of sixty-five years.

(Answered by Mr. McKenna.) Admiral of the Fleet Sir John Fisher has occupied the post of First Sea Lord for four years, having been appointed on 20th October, 1904. He was promoted to Admiral of the Fleet on 4th December, 1905.

Weekly Half-Holiday at Aberdeen Post Office.

MR. PIRIE (Aberdeen, N.): To ask the Postmaster-General whether the Postal Telegraph Clerks' Association expressed the wish of its members that paragraph 281 of the Hobhouse Committee's Report, relating to the weekly half-holiday, should not be enforced; if he consented to defer to the wishes of the staff in this respect; whether at Aberdeen a new system has been introduced against the desires of the staff and in spite of its strong protests; and, if so, if he will state the reasons for enforcing the innovation at this office.

(Answered by Mr. Sydney Buxton.) Representations were made to me on this subject, and I gave them my fullest consideration. Wherever practicable I am desirous of meeting the wishes of the staff in the matter of the Saturday half-holiday, but attendances must of course coincide with the incidence of the work. This is what has lately been done at Aberdeen.

Finance Act—Section 6 (1)—Issue of Order in Council.

MR. VERNEY (Buckinghamshire, N.): To ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he can state when the Order in Council will be issued under Section 6 (1) of the Finance Act, 1908.

(Answered by Mr. John Burns.) The Order in Council has been made and will shortly be published. A circular letter will be issued by the Board, as soon as practicable, forwarding copies of the Order to councils of counties and county boroughs, and explaining the scheme embodied in it.

Closing of School at Magherahamlet, County Down.

CAPTAIN CRAIG (Down, E.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he can state the reasons which have prompted the Commissioners of National Education in Ireland to close the Church of Ireland national school, Magherahamlet, Ballynahinch, county Down.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) The Commissioners of National Education inform me that on the resignation of the late teacher grants were withdrawn from this school, which had an average attendance of only nineteen pupils, under the provisions of Rule 179 (c), as, in view of the educational facilities afforded by other schools in the locality, it was no longer required. There are two national schools under Protestant management within a distance of two miles of this school, and the pupils formerly on its rolls can conveniently attend one or the other of these schools.

War Office—Duties of Assistant Financial Secretary.

MR. ASHTON (Bedfordshire, Luton): To ask the Secretary of State for War whether, in defining the duties of the Assistant Financial Secretary in the necessary Order in Council, there will be included the duty of advising the administrative officers at the War Office and in commands on all questions of Army expenditure, as included in the Order in Council of the 10th August, 1904, among the duties of the Director of Army Finance and Accounting Officer to the War Office.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Haldane.) The reply is in the affirmative.

Loans for Unemployed.

MR. LAURENCE HARDY (Kent, Ashford): To ask the Prime Minister whether he can give an undertaking that the debate on unemployment will not take place until the returns which have been prepared with regard to local loans and special loans for unemployed, and which he promised to the House, have been circulated amongst Members of the House.

(Answered by Mr. Asquith.) It is evident that the debate which has been fixed for Monday cannot be postponed. A statement relative to loans sanctioned by the Local Government Board, or with respect to which application for sanction has been made to them, will be laid upon the Table to-day, and every effort will be made to get it circulated by Monday.

Decay of the Hop Industry.

MR. LAURENCE HARDY: To ask the Prime Minister whether he is aware that, partly owing to the condition of the hop industry, so fully explained to the Government in the evidence before the Hop Committee recently published, and partly owing to despair on the part of the growers, large areas of hops are daily being grubbed, and in consequence many labourers thrown out of employment; and whether, in his proposals to deal with the special problem of unemployment during this winter, he has given special attention to this portion of the problem, namely, unemployment in the rural districts.

(Answered by Mr. John Burns.) The Prime Minister has asked me to reply to this Question. I am aware that the Select Committee reported that the acreage of land under hops in England had been reduced during the last twenty years by about one-third, the Home produce of hops, however, continuing nearly the same owing to the increased yield per acre. I can assure the hon. Member that all aspects of the unemployed problem have received the attention of the Government.

LICENSING BILL

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

[Mr. EMMOTT (Oldham) in the Chair.]

Clause 10:

*MR. JAMES HOPE (Sheffield, Central) moved to omit subsection 1 of the clause, in order to raise the whole question of compensation. He said he should like to see substituted for the plan proposed in the Bill the compensation paid under the 1904 Act, which provided—

“(1) Where Quarter Sessions refuse the renewal of an existing on-licence under this Act, a sum equal to the difference between the value of the licensed premises (calculated as if the licence were subject to the same conditions of renewal as were applicable immediately before the passing of this Bill, and including in that value the amount of any depreciation of trade fixtures arising by reason of the refusal to renew the licence, and the value which those premises would bear if they were not licensed premises, be paid as compensation to the persons interested in the licensed premises."

He hoped that the Government would meet the Amendment with a request that he would say what provisions he would substitute supposing the Amendment were carried. No doubt it would involve a considerable re-lifting of the Bill. He wished to see the debate on the broad lines of compensation under the existing system and that under the plan proposed in the Bill. When the words in the Bill of 1904 came to be considered they were interpreted by the Inland Revenue to mean a twenty-five years purchase which was practically the same as the "annual value" of the licence as defined in this Bill, and finally there came what was known as the Kennedy judgment. The point of that judgment was the rejection of the contention of the Inland Revenue and the substitution for it of the difference between the market value of premises licensed and premises unlicensed. Mr. Justice Kennedy laid down that—

"The tribunal has to assess the amount of compensation by finding the price of the licensed premises in the open market. . . . and deducting the price which the premises would fetch in the open market if unlicensed."

He went on to say—

"What is the object of our inquiry? I cannot do better than adopt the language of the interesting Memorandum of Sir Henry Primrose, the Chairman of the Board of Inland Revenue. It is to find the price which the owner of the freehold of the premises might expect to obtain for them qua premises enjoying the privileges of a licence, if sold in the open market."

Upon finding that price and taking the difference, compensation was to be awarded. It was constantly argued that that judgment was wrong and that the present Bill would restore the position that the Inland Revenue had maintained. That could not hold water for one moment. The Inland Revenue would give twenty-five years purchase. This Bill would give ten and a half years at most. The new proposals of the Prime Minister did not, he thought, affect the compensation at all. He would like to be clear on the point. The proposal of the Bill was that the reduction period stood at fourteen years, and a new proposal had been made that there should be a further period of seven years, during which the monopoly value should not be charged, although the licensed house might be dealt with at the discretion of the magistrate or by local option. He must not take it, so he understood, that the reduction period extended beyond fourteen years. Under the contention of the Inland Revenue, which the Kennedy judgment disallowed, twenty-five years would have been allowed on the annual value of the assessment, but under this scheme of fourteen years the average would work out only at five and three-quarter years purchase. There was to be no reduction and no compensation in the first year of the reduction period, so that the first compensation paid would be taken at a thirteen years annuity at 4 per cent., and that would work out at some ten years purchase. As the term went on the number of years purchase became less. But taking the average, and supposing the rate of reduction was the same, the period would work out at five and three-quarter years as against twenty-five years, which would have been the case under the Inland Revenue contention before the Kennedy judgment. Even if the Kennedy judgment were wrong, still under the former conditions the licence-holders would have been four or five times better off than under the present Bill. However, the Kennedy judgment was the law, and he ventured to say that it was based on perfectly fair and equitable principles. When it was sought to acquire in the public interest any rights of a valuable consideration, he submitted that the only fair thing to do in the case of compensation was to take the market value. The difference was enormous between the compensation now being paid and the compensation which would be paid under the operation of the Bill. He would take the case of one house, and if the names connected with it were desired they would no doubt be given privately by those who put them forward. It was the case of a beer-house in a town in Essex. The amount of compensation awarded to owners was £1,415, but under this Bill, owing to the improvements in site, the value without the licence was actually greater than with the licence, and therefore no compensation would be taken at all. In another house in the East-end of London, the amount of compensation awarded to owners was £2,200. The amount of compensation that would be awarded under the present Bill was arrived at as follows:—The assessment of the premises as licensed was £45, the estimated assessment unlicensed, £35. The difference to be capitalised amounted only to £10, and therefore, if it were capitalised in the second year it would work out at £100 compensation, as against the £2,200 which it actually obtained under the present Act. Other examples might be taken where there was a much higher difference between the licensed and the unlicensed assessment. He would take a house in the middle of London, where on the same principle the amount of compensation awarded was £4,652, the difference which had to be capitalised amounted to £55, and the most that could be got in that case would be £550. The more a man paid under this scheme the less he would get, and all this time he would be paying a compensation levy. The nearer he came to the end of the reduction period the less compensation he would get; if his house was closed in the last year he would get a mere fractional compensation, but every year he would be paying his levy. On that ground alone, he thought if they looked to the reduction period there was no kind of fairness. If a man lost his licence in the last year of the reduction period he would get a very small fraction of its market value. This, he thought, would induce the licence-holders to try to get their licences taken away as soon as possible, and, although they might take care to keep within the law, it was a distinct temptation to them to use every means in their power, not to be able to carry on their business during those years, but to get compensation at the earliest possible period, and thereby so far as they could, the benefit money which they would then and which they would lose had to wait until the end of the

The result of these provisions was to put all the licence-holders in the position of leaseholders in that would expire at the end of ten years. At present they were in what he might call a permanent subject to good behaviour. That, of course, was always the position, even before the 1904 Act, of the old beer-houses, and since that Act it had been the position of both classes of houses. They would be also subject to special taxation all the time. The injustice of the position had only to be stated to appeal to any fair-minded man. He called attention to one peculiarity of the drafting of this section. It began by saying—

“Where compensation is payable in respect of the extinction of an old on-licence, the amount payable shall be determined by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue.”

It went on to say that—

“The actual licence-holders, apart from the owners, may have certain compensation.”

This provision would work out very curiously in certain instances where, owing to the advancement of site value, the unlicensed value was greater than the licensed value. In those cases no compensation would be payable and nothing would go to the actual managers of the premises. He favoured the suggestion that the draughtsman should be allowed occasionally to give his own explanation to the House. The draughtsman was an exceedingly able and painstaking man, and the result of this clause, he thought, could only be attributed to the fact that he had been harassed by the vacillating purposes or intentions of the Government. He might be told that, arguing on the results of compensation on the basis of the assessments under Schedule A, the assessments were far too low. There were enormous variations in assessments in different parts of the country, and they were often made on no very consistent or uniform plan; but even admitting they were too low, why did the Government take as a basis for compensation a standard which they knew to be wrong? If the assessments were too low why did they adopt them? He thought the answer was that in order to suit their purposes in this Bill they deliberately adopted a standard as a basis of compensation which they knew was not a fair one for the purpose. He would ask the Committee to come back to the only true and fair basis of compensation, which was not an arbitrary assessment, not a hard and fast rule, but a consideration of actual value, as it could only be determined by conditions of the market at the time. Last week he ventured to accuse hon. Members opposite of the Manichean theory; he accused them to-day of Lollardism. As he understood Lollard doctrine it was that unless a man was in possession he had no rights of property. hon. Members opposite had no right to say to a licence-holder, who perhaps was out of grace, any right which other citizens enjoyed. When other citizens had their property taken away for the purpose of public improvements the property was fairly valued, and 10 per cent. additional allowed. In this case the amount allowed was only about one-eighth of the fair market value. Although hon. Members opposite might dislike the licensed trade because they believed it was dangerous and liable to abuse, that was no reason why they could not treat those engaged in it, so long as they kept the law, on exactly the same basis as other citizens. It was in order to establish a fair scale of compensation that he moved the Amendment.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 6, line 14, to leave out subsection 1)." —(Mr. James Hope.)

Question proposed, "That lines 14 and 15 stand part of the Clause."

*MR. CHARLES ROBERTS (Lincoln) said he wanted to recall what hon. Members opposite had said in reference to the somewhat difficult and complicated subject of compensation. The mover of the Amendment had told the Committee that the Kennedy judgment gave the fair and natural basis on which compensation should be computed. His first point about that was that he did not believe that that judgment expressed what was intended by the authors of the Act of 1904 as the natural basis for compensation. What they intended was to give compensation on a property basis simply to those who were interested in the premises. Even the tenant was given compensation on that basis, but he was not given any compensation for the loss of his profits. He thought it was plain from the language which the authors of the Act used that they did not intend to give compensation for the loss of wholesale trade profits. He would give some illustrations of this. The then Home Secretary explained that—

"Compensation was given in respect of licences, not on the loss of business profits but on depreciation of the premises arising from the fact that the extinction of the licence prevented the house from being used for the purpose for which it was most adapted."

The then Solicitor-General said—

"What was estimated was the depreciation of property, and that was the whole basis and foundation of the Bill. It was said that the bulk of the compensation would go to the owners, who in many cases were brewers. He totally and absolutely denied it."

It was obvious, however, on the figures, that only 11 per cent. had gone to the tenants on the average, and as a matter of fact, in many individual cases the tenant had had to put up with a £10 or a £5 note. The compensation which the tenant had actually got had been illogical in origin and capricious in amount, the standard had been anything but uniform, and the bulk of the compensation had gone where the then Solicitor-General said it would not go. He would take this statement of the case made by Mr. Cripps, the author of the standard book on compensation, in the House of Commons during the debates of 1904. He said—

"It had been argued that when licensed premises were taken for the purpose of public improvements two kinds of compensation were in force. There was a trading compensation and a compensation for a diminution in the value of the premises themselves. As a rule the trade compensation was the larger figure of the two. But in this Bill there was no trade compensation of any kind. They were looking at the difference in the value of the premises as licensed or unlicensed, and this did not bring into consideration what was known as trade compensation at all."

Taking together those three quotations, it was plain that the judgment of Mr. Justice Kennedy was not intended by the authors of the Act, though the hon. Member for the Central division of Sheffield thought it was only natural.

MR. JAMES HOPE: My argument was based on the contention of the Inland Revenue prior to the Kennedy judgment. Would the hon. Gentleman accept that as fair, namely, twenty-five years purchase?

*MR. CHARLES ROBERTS thought that the fact that the Kennedy judgment was not foreseen by the Inland Revenue strengthened his contention that that was not the original intention of the Act. As the Committee knew, the Inland Revenue tried to establish a basis which was different from the Kennedy judgment, and personally he thought the basis which was adopted, or attempted to be adopted, by the Inland Revenue was not really so satisfactory as the present scheme of the Bill. What were the real objections to the Kennedy judgment as they found it in actual practice? He thought they would find all over the country the greatest possible dissatisfaction with it on the part of compensation authorities. The compensation authority to which he belonged, estimating the amount which would have been payable before that judgment and directly afterwards in the case of the same houses, found a difference of at least 50 per cent. It raised the compensation payable by at least that amount and sometimes more. The licensing committee of the Liverpool justices found exactly the same experience—the compensation payable was double, and the actual reduction of licences cut down by one-half. Of course, if it was fair there was nothing more to be said; but was it fair? As a matter of fact, the authority to which he belonged, while administering that judgment on a conservative basis, not trying to evade the law, and at the same time trying to act fairly, found in actual practice that it worked out at prices which would not be paid in the market—not likely to be paid even in the time of boom prices. He believed the Kennedy judgment was based on the practice of trade valuers in the boom times. It was not justified at the present time by the actual state of the market.

*CAPTAIN FABER (Hampshire, Andover): Will the hon. Gentleman allow me to say they go on the present figures and not on the trade boom figures in my county?

*MR. CHARLES ROBERTS said that his own local experience did not agree. Lancashire had practically thrown over the Kennedy judgment. The hon. Member for Aberdeenshire in his breezy way had said the whole thing was a swindle, but one of the newspapers evidently thought that was too "breezy" an expression to be Parliamentary, and described it as an inequitable arrangement. Well, he knew that in Lancashire they found the prices they offered accepted after throwing over the Kennedy judgment. The authorities never really knew whether they were being "had" or not in this matter. The compensation authorities in administering this fund with fairness to both sides had to give roughly 10s. per barrel, but how was the authority to know that that amount of profit was made? Certainly it was not universally made; although there might be a rise in the price of raw materials, the sum would still in practice be maintained at 10s. He would take the case of the houses just on the margin of existence. What would happen? They would put in a tenant who knew how to work up the trade by the "long pull," and various other customs and methods, and the barrellage might increase, though the profits would suffer. In its essence it was utterly unfair. Under the 1904 Act compensation was not paid for the retail profits of the publican, though he lost them, and could not take away his business to other premises. In the case of the brewer they did pay wholesale profits though he could make them in another house, possibly close by. In the case of the "Crown Inn," Cobham, compensation was based on the wholesale profits made in that house, and it was stated in evidence that there were two houses close by belonging to the same firm of brewers. The amount paid in that case was £1,497, and the greater part of it represented brewery profits, although a large portion of the trade was probably not lost by the brewers in question. The hon. Member who spoke last had given cases of how this system of compensation would work inequitably. He stated that it worked out at only one-eighth of the present scale. One of the things he noticed was that the trade critics of this scheme never agreed amongst themselves as to how the actual scale would work out. The brief of the liquor trade which was supplied to hon. Members put it at one-third. Others at a fourth, or a fifth, but the hon. Member put it at one-eighth. He asked the Committee to realise that one fallacy ran through the hon. Gentleman's statement of the case. The hon. Gentleman had taken in every instance the existing Schedule A for income-tax; but under this Bill they were going to have the real Schedule A. He would be exceedingly glad if the hon. Gentleman would furnish him with the names and the full calculations in the cases which he had presented to the committee, because he had always made a real attempt to try and understand the definite argument put before the country in the Press and elsewhere by the trade. The hon. Gentleman would himself admit that there existed a great deal of under-assessment in the country, but the actual amount had yet to be ascertained. Let him take one or two instances. In the case of the "Crown Inn," Cobham, which was the subject of Mr. Justice Kennedy's judgment, the compensation was £1,479 10s., with £300 for site and structure; or a total of nearly £1,800. The income-tax assessment under Schedule A was only £19 10s. He did not think the Committee realised how far the robbery had gone. Did the hon. Member really say that the only fair and natural basis for compensation was a basis which worked out at ninety-two years purchase of the assessable value?

MR. JAMES HOPE: That depends upon the profits.

*MR. CHARLES ROBERTS said he would take another case, their old friend, the "Coach and Horses," Portsmouth. They knew its value was £10,000. It was paying rates on a gross assessment of £144, and a net assessment of £120. Did hon. Members opposite think that a fair assessment?

LORD R. CECIL (Marylebone, E.): Certainly.

*MR. CHARLES ROBERTS said that in that case the hon. Member did not agree with the ordinary practice of the London Assessment Committees, which in such a case would be to take half the licence value for the purpose of assessment. The "Coach and Horses" was valued at £7,500 for the licence, and £2,500 for the site and structure. The right assessment, according to the ordinary practice of the London Assessment Committee, would be £312 instead of £120 made up thus: they would take the value of site and structure £2,500 and half the licensed value £3,750, or a total of £6,250, as the capital value to be assessed at 5 per cent. This worked out at £312. That was not an exaggeration, because two of the greatest living authorities on rating said that the Assessment Committees ought to take two-thirds of the licence-value instead of one-half, which latter figure they said was unfair. He had a return of fifty-six premises in London which had lost their licences under the Compensation Act, with the new valuation which had been made of the premises in use for other purposes. The compensation awarded in these fifty-six cases, the new rateable value of which was £1,765, was £134,000 odd. Taking the ordinary practice, that half the compensation awarded should be taken for the purpose of rating, the value of these fifty-six licences for rating purposes should be taken at £67,200, or an annual value, at 5 per cent., of £3,360, to which must be added the present rateable value of £1,765, giving a total of £5,125. They were actually rated at £3,169, so that there was a loss of rateable value there of £2,000, or 40 per cent. Assuming that the rest of the licensed premises in London were 40 per cent. under-assessed, that meant a loss to the rates of £322,000.

SIR F. BANBURY (City of London): That is the fault of the assessment committees.

*MR. CHARLES ROBERTS said he was quite certain that the under-assessment in the provinces was considerably more, and the loss from this cause must amount at least to £900,000, so that the total under-assessment, involved a total annual loss to the rates of the country, of at least £1,200,000. But, further, this assessable value was the basis, not merely for rates but also for taxation, the licence duty, and everything else. All the difficulties in this matter arose from the fact that the licence value included all kinds of different elements of value which they wanted to get separated, and, he believed, if they once got clearly in their minds what were these different elements of value, it would be seen that the scheme in the Bill was a fair and just one. The licence—value consisted (1) of the value of the site and structure; (2) the monopoly value attached to the premises because of the licence; (3) the retail profit of the tenant, and (4) the brewer's wholesale profit. For the purpose of rating, what they wanted to get at was the value of the land and buildings as increased by the fact that the premises had a licence attached to them. That they did not get at the present time; that they would get as an indirect result of the working of this clause. The Bill gave an opportunity to the owners of licensed premises to reassess their properties, and he thought they would be well advised to take that opportunity. And when it came to compensation, what they wanted to get at was fair compensation, first, for the loss of the monopoly value due to the licence, and, secondly, the loss of the tenant's trade profits. That was what this clause did. He believed the more the Committee investigated the clause the more they would see that it cleared away all the practical difficulties, all the intricacies, and all the unfairnesses of the Kennedy judgment, and that it had put the compensation on a really fair and just basis.

*MR. BARNARD (Kidderminster) said that the speech of the hon. Member who had just sat down showed how essential it was that they should have soon a Government Valuation Bill in order to clear away present difficulties. He failed to see why complaints should be made against a publican or any other ratepayer in the country because he did not get his house rated on a higher basis than the one on which it was rated. The complaint should be on the other leg. He would remind the Committee, when, for instance, complaint was made with regard to the rating of the "Coach and Horses," that the Government were ratepayers in Portsmouth; and if there was anything wrong in the rating of that house they could have very well intervened and have asked that it should be put on a proper basis. He came to the point of what the compensation authorities were doing in this country. His experience was not the same as that of the hon. Member for Lincoln; and he had been this week taking part in an annual meeting. What did they do? They had nothing to do with the boom in prices or what people paid for the premises. They had to find what the man inside the house was paying for beer and other commodities, and then they had to find how much he could buy the beer at from somebody else, if he were not "tied." If a man was paying 36s. for beer to the brewer to whom he was "tied," and he could buy beer in the market of similar grade and standard from somebody else at 26s., it was obvious that the person concerned had to deduct 26s. from 36s., and the difference represented the price which was being paid for the house, and that was, he thought, the basis of fair compensation. He came to the celebrated Kennedy judgment. He was very glad to hear, and he welcomed the remark of the hon. Member for Lincoln when he asked if it was fair. Fairness was what some of them were trying to achieve, quite as much as some of his hon. friends who represented temperance. He did not think the question of the Kennedy judgment was in the minds of the Members in the House when they debated the Act of 1904, but he had nothing to do with that. He accepted Mr. Cripps' definition of what compensation was. But the hon. Member for Lincoln, after discussing it, stopped short of wholesale profits. He would have been glad if he had given them the value of his research, in comparing the compensation of the present Bill with the compensation of the 1904 Act. They did not compare in the slightest degree in this respect. Under the 1904 Act there was nothing to do with the monopoly value. The 1904 Act undoubtedly, in extinguishing houses, left the opportunity to the brewers with regard to other houses to get a good share of the trade of the suppressed houses. One could not put forward a comparison of that description in regard to this Bill, when the monopoly value of the suppressed houses went, according to the Bill, to the public exchequer. He put it to the Committee, whether that consideration did not altogether alter the state of affairs. That brought him directly to this question of compensation. He had often heard it said in the House, that if the trade paid, it was pretty immaterial, and could not seriously matter what the amount of compensation was. If that was the case why, it was asked, should there be such a discussion amongst those who did not take the trade view? If the trade expressed its own opinions as to what was the most convenient, legitimate, and easy method, why not attach such compensation to the Bill? He would take one illustration from many which would serve his purpose. Yesterday they were discussing the question of Welsh local option—he would not refer to the point beyond an illustration: if that local option came into force at once, and if the position of affairs was as an eloquent Member put it in his speech last night, what would happen? The Welsh people would be draining this national fund, which the people in England would be paying and they would be getting an enormous advantage. On the question of compensation, as a whole, he understood it to mean that they gave the compensation to a person for the value that they took from him. The things which were bought and sold in the open market, things which undoubtedly commanded a price, to the ordinary thinking mind were matters which well came within the definition of compensation. Let him give three examples: one would be from the very near past, another from the present; and the third from the future. The past illustration he would take was the Water Board, the present the Government Dock Bill, and the future the electricity proposals of last Monday night. What happened before the Water Board was created? They had Lord Cross and his Committee, Lord Llandaff's and Lord Balfour of Burleigh's Commissions, and the London County Council proposals on the Welsh scheme, and what not. They had other things to which he need not allude. What did all that amount to? It amounted to this, that the water companies had had fair warning, and that they well knew what might be expected, and that the public eye was upon them. And yet what occurred? They went to a court—a court created by this House, and consisting of eminent men, who decided that London was to pay to the water companies £47,000,000 sterling to buy them up. It also decided that the directors should receive something like £220,000, because their position was got rid of. He was not finding any great fault about it except this, that, as chairman of the Board, he was troubled enough to obtain the money to pay the interest on the £47,000,000 to-day. But it was recognised that what the companies were to receive was the value of the income which they could show they earned with the usual multiplier of years applied to it. Then as to the Dock Bill he crossed swords with the Government who were proposing it. In a respectful way he approved of the measure, but they proposed to pay to the dock companies an income undoubtedly of a generous and lavish description. Why? Because in the public interest they thought it desirable that they should get out of the way this impediment to the improvement of the Port of London. Lastly, the electricity proposals which they had had before the House that week. What occurred? It was proposed that the company should have granted to it some rights to trade, and at the same time a time-limit—he wished that some time-limit were in this Bill—was granted to the electricity people under the Bill. That brought him to this provision, and he could not see why they should not, in this clause, endeavour to give such compensation as represented the situation, and try and compensate as far as possible all the existing interests. It could not be denied that when they reached the end of the twenty-one years, or came to the fourteenth year, under that monopoly value the position of the owners of the houses would be ever so much worse, and they would not be able to charge—he did not debate whether they should or should not—the same sum of money which they previously could in connection with the distribution of their commodities. With regard to the security of the tenant, he was very pleased to read in the newspapers that the Government were making some modification in that direction. It appeared to him that they had a right to ask that they should adopt previous custom in this respect. He had mentioned the Water Companies' directors and the Dock Bill, in regard to which it was proposed to give the directors compensation. If they could in every other department of life of the ordinary man, whose living was taken away, give to him, at any rate, a direct compensation as far as possible on business lines, they should do so here. In the case of these tenants they took away their usual occupation. If 30,000 of the tenants, out of 95,000, were got rid of they would not have the opportunity of renewing their occupation under the same conditions. He was, therefore, personally very glad that it should be provided that at any rate they should have one year's certain compensation to themselves. He recognised that it might be that a man had only been in a house for a few months, and, therefore, it would not be reasonable to give him more, but he should like to have a statement from the Government as to what would be the position of and control over these Commissioners. Would they be amenable to Parliament? Would they be amenable to something which was put into this Bill? Would they be a statutory body, or under whose control would they be? If it were provided by the clause, which he should welcome, that the tenant was to have not less than one year's compensation he should like to hear from the Government that their meaning was that the Commissioners should exercise a sympathetic and generous attitude towards the tenant who had been in business for many years and who had been injured. His last point had reference to a class as to whom he had put Amendments on the Paper, which he supposed would never be reached, like those of many other Members. He had tried to draw attention to the effect of the Bill on the home-brew houses. There were not many home-brew houses, but he noticed that at the end of this section they gave protection to fixtures. After all, the old publican who brewed his own beer and had a racketty plant, and from whom was taken away under this Bill a licence to sell the beer, was not in the position of the big brewer, because his plant was left on his hands as a lot of scrap iron, and the value of it would be taken away. He thought under these circumstances it was not an attack upon the scheme of the Bill and did not interfere with any principle, to ask if the Government could not extend some consideration to these little men, and, either by an addition to the word "fixtures," or in some other way, meet their case so that they would receive adequate compensation to meet their special circumstances. In his constituency there were no less than sixty-three men who had public-house licences brewing their beer. Under a schedule of the Bill 120 licences would be reduced to about fifty, and the result would be to impose upon these little men something which he did not think the Government meant, and which he thought the Temperance Party in the House did not desire, because the position did not touch any of the general principles of the Bill. For these reasons he ventured to put forward these latter questions to the Government, who he hoped would see their way to alter or modify in some form the method of compensation put forward in this Bill.

*MR. SHERWELL (Huddersfield) said that it was almost inevitable that the argument in connection with this Amendment should turn on the interpretation of what was market value. He sympathised with the plea that if the principle of compensation was to be recognised in a statute the basis of that compensation should be strictly fair and just. It was only in the extension that hon. Members gave to what they called market value that he found himself in serious disagreement with them. When the definition came to be expanded it always turned on an endorsement of what had become known as the Kennedy judgment. His first objection to the acceptance of that judgment was that it appeared to violate the express intention of the framers of the Act of 1904, which that judgment was supposed to have interpreted. The principle underlying the compensation provisions of that Act was that compensation was to be given on the assumption that the Act had not passed, or, in the words suggested by the present Lord Chancellor, as if the licence were liable in respect of renewal to all the contingencies to which it was liable prior to the passing of the Act. As he read

*MR. SHERWELL (Huddersfield) said that it was almost inevitable that the argument in connection with this Amendment should turn on the interpretation of what was market value. He sympathised with the plea that if the principle of compensation was to be recognised in a statute the basis of that compensation should be strictly fair and just. It was only in the extension that hon. Members gave to what they called market value that he found himself in serious disagreement with them. When the definition came to be expanded it always turned on an endorsement of what had become known as the Kennedy judgment. His first objection to the acceptance of that judgment was that it appeared to violate the express intention of the framers of the Act of 1904, which that judgment was supposed to have interpreted. The principle underlying the compensation provisions of that Act was that compensation was to be given on the assumption that the Act had not passed, or, in the words suggested by the present Lord Chancellor, as if the licence were liable in respect of renewal to all the contingencies to which it was liable prior to the passing of the Act. As he read the Kennedy judgment that clear and explicit intention of the Parliament of 1904 received altogether inadequate consideration. This was apparent in the distinction laid down in that judgment between the ordinary public-house and the ante-1869 beer-house. The ante-1869 beer-house had a statutory right to renewal, and therefore stood in a far stronger position as regards security of tenure than a fully-licensed house prior to 1904. Yet in Mr. Justice Kennedy's judgment only one year's extra profits were sanctioned in the case of the beer-house. Another consideration which prevented him from accepting the Kennedy judgment as a satisfactory basis of compensation was that it did not take into account the actual character of the licence. The central factor in the judgment was the brewer's and not the retailer's profits. He admitted that in the internal administration of the drink traffic in recent years the statutory distinction between the brewer and the retailer had been largely lost sight of. But, after all, the retailer's business or profit was one thing and the brewer's business or profit was another, and no basis of compensation could be satisfactory which did not observe the explicit distinction between the two. But his most serious objection to the judgment was that it recognised compensation for enhanced value resulting from the reduction of competition in the trade itself. He could not sanction the idea that when such enhancement took place as the clear result of State action the licensees of the remaining premises should receive additional compensation. Even the Government proposal did not get rid of that defect. Under the clause as it now stood every licence-holder would get compensation on the basis of the enhanced value of his licence resulting from reduced competition. Indeed the evil instead of being removed was actually intensified, because the Bill accelerated the rate of reduction and by so much accelerated the rate of enhancement of value. It might be urged that the surviving licensees paid for their enhanced value in the compensation levies, but if so, what became of the familiar plea that those levies were really insurance premiums paid for security of tenure during the reduction period? They could not have it both ways: either the compensation levy was to be the equivalent for the enhanced value accruing from State action or it was an insurance premium pure and simple. It could not be both. He invited hon. Members opposite to choose which horn of the dilemma they would elect to be impaled upon. The plea was a strange one in view of the great inequalities of incidence in the burden of the compensation levies imposed. Obviously, the largest and most prosperous houses were to be found in London and the big cities, but under the schedule of the Bill a publican in London paid a levy at the rate of 9·7 per cent. of the annual rateable value of his premises, a publican in a city of over 500,000 inhabitants paid at the rate of 12·7 per cent., but in small urban districts of less than 5,000 population the compensation levy represented not 9·7 per cent. as was the case in London, but over 16 per cent. of the annual rateable value of the premises. He might be told that this was not so unfair as it seemed, because the poorer and smaller houses would be the first to be suppressed under the Act, but it was not a good argument to say that because a man was doomed to speedy extinction he should be called upon to pay more than a man to whom a long life was assured. The inversion of the law of equity could hardly be carried so far. It was clear that the intention of the framers of the Act of 1904 was that compensation value should not include any enhanced value that would result from the passing of the Act. The late Home Secretary, speaking in support of the Bill on 20th April, 1904, in this House, said—

"The next point we have to consider is the amount of compensation to be awarded to the licensee [not the owner or the brewer, but the licensee], and we have decided that the fair measure of compensation which ought to be afforded is the difference between the value of the licensed premises and the value of the premises without a licence. Of course, that will be calculated as if the Act had not been passed."

The right hon. Gentleman defended that by a reference to the Majority Report of the Royal Commission. The matter was put in an equally clear form by the right would take the amount for which the property was assessed to income-tax, and then he imagined they would multiply that by so many years purchase—say twenty-five years purchase.

THE PRIME MINISTER AND FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. ASQUITH, Fifehire, E.): Does the hon. Member assume that it is a freehold?

*MR. G. D. FABER said he was assuming it for the purpose of his argument, and he multiplied the sum at which it was assessed by twenty-five years purchase. The Prime Minister said that in that way they would arrive at the true value. But if he might give a case, he thought that they would see at once that by that method they could by no possibility arrive at the true value, because they were eliminating the profits on the trade of the house. He could not cite a better instance than that of the celebrated "Coach and Horses." It served as an illustration as well as any other instance which he could adduce. It would illustrate his argument in a concrete arithmetical manner. The reserve price put upon the "Coach and Horses" by the War Office, the then owners, was £10,000. The house was assessed to income-tax under Schedule A at £144 a year. If they multiplied that £144 by twenty five years purchase they arrive at the figure, not of £10,000, the reserved price fixed, but £3,600. This showed an actual deficiency of £6,400; so that the War Office had put the property at much too high a value if they took the Government's method of arriving at it. If every member of the Committee threshed this matter out he must agree with him that the method adopted by the Government brought out a figure which was absolutely under the fair and proper measure of value. Still pursuing his inquiry in regard to the "Coach and Horses," they found that £10,000 was the reserve price put upon the property by the Government as the proper value, and was the price actually paid for it. How had the War Office arrived at the sum of £10,000? They could not have arrived at it by proceeding upon the Government method, namely, assessment for income-tax purposes, and multiplying the assessed sum by so many years' purchase. The War Office must have proceeded on entirely different lines. They might up to a certain point have multiplied the sum assessed to income-tax by so many years' purchase, but they must have also taken into account the value of the premises for the purpose of trade, and this was how the difference was made up between the sum of £3,600 on the Government basis of calculation, and the £10,000 on the War Office method of ascertaining the value. The actual capitalised value of the trade done in the house meant in round figures the difference between £3,600 and £10,000, in other words £6,400. By that means and by that means only, had the War Office arrived at the reserve price of £10,000 which they had put upon the property.

MR. ASQUITH: The War Office were bound to adopt that valuation because of the Kennedy judgment.

*MR. G. D. FABER: Surely the War Office were not bound to do anything of the kind. They were the owners of the property, and they could adopt any system of valuation they pleased. Why were they bound to follow the Kennedy judgment?

MR. ASQUITH: As a proposition of law.

*MR. G. D. FABER said that surely the War Office were under no restriction or compulsion. All they had to do was to the best of their ability to arrive at the value of the "Coach and Horses." It might be that there was some flaw in his argument, but he could not see it. He thought that a great fallacy underlay the proposition contained in Clause 4. They were now eliminating from their calculation of the value any trade done in the house. It did not matter to him, for the purpose of his argument, whether it was the holder of the licence who was owner of the property, or whether it was a case of a tied house. The principle was the same whether it was the retail owner or whether it was the tenant plus the tie to the brewer. In assessing compensation under this clause, they altogether the value of in the house. There was from that, as he understood. That was why to say the Act of 1904 needed judgment which was sound. All they had establish was the value of property in the open market. Government seemed to desire as part of the value of the bringing altogether the trade house. Some Members on had been impressed by the that criticism, because they avoid it by saying that the the Bill was perfectly sound at so many years' purchase Schedule A for the purpose of—and that it was no fault of of the licensed property if rent had been too low. But houses were assessed, whether or rates, by a public authority, need to him in no way to meet ment to say that because a house was assessed too low, the owner of the house perfectly compensation was assessed at so many years' purchase, and the amount an insufficient sum. Great and as the injustice was by taking measure of compensation adopted Bill, it became all the more when they considered that all the Government proposed to give an annuity for a certain number of years, based on this wholly unsound method of assessing the value. In the case of the "Coach and Horses," £10,000 had been given for the property; £7,500 established by competent valuers to be the value of the licence, and £2,500 to be the value of the bricks and mortar on the ground. The Government, assessing this annuity—the maximum annuity being for thirteen years—would do it in this way: The assessment for purposes of income-tax with the licence was £104; without the licence, £104, and, therefore, the sum they would give to the present owners of the "Coach and Horses" would be a principal sum, which would represent a thirteen years' annuity of £40. That, according to the table, would come to £400. The £2,500, representing the bricks and mortar and the ground, added to the £400, amounted to £2,900.

So in exchange for property sold only the other day by a great Government Department for £10,000, all the purchasers would get under this clause would be £2,900. As far as the compensation period was concerned, no doubt it was past argument and past praying for, now that the earlier clauses of the Bill had been carried. But what he hoped was not past argument, not past praying for, was that, at any rate in assessing the beggarly compensation for the compensation period, the House would proceed on a sound basis, and not on a wholly slippery and fallacious one. He could not understand how and why the Government could possibly have arrived at such an inequitable basis. It surely could not be that they desired to strip the owner of licensed property of almost everything for which he had paid full value. It could not be mere spite, mere animosity—he hoped not—against the owner of the property. Surely equity and fair dealing ought still to hold force, notwithstanding what the private opinions of members on the other side might be. He ventured to put it otherwise, and to think that in this case the Government without intention to inflict this irreparable injury on those interested in licensed houses, had innocently gone astray; had by mistake lost sight altogether of the vital factor of the case, viz., that the greater part of the value of a licensed house lay not in its assessed value for purposes of income-tax under Schedule A, but in the trade done in the house. The Government ought not to have it both ways. When extracting taxation from the licence-owner, they taxed him under two heads, under Schedule A and Schedule D; when assessing him for death-duties, they assessed him at the full market value of the property. Now, when they proposed to give him what they called compensation, they eliminated altogether the consideration of profits, and simply considered the bare assessment value of the property for income-tax purposes and nothing more.

*MR. DICKINSON (St. Pancras, N.) said the hon. Member had made an eloquent appeal based upon the idea that all they had to consider on this occasion was—what was fair to the public-house interest and to the public. Of course, that must always be an important consideration, but at the same time there was another consideration which they must bear in mind—that which arose from the peculiar condition of affairs in 1904. They were entitled to say that the Act of 1904 was the result of what was more or less a Parliamentary contract. The public-house trade had obtained a very important concession, security of tenure, which was most valuable to them, and in return for that they had obtained amongst other things these clauses which entitled them to compensation in the event of their being disturbed. The terms and conditions of that contract were very clearly discussed and set out in the debates in 1904, and at the risk even of repeating some of the observations of the hon. Member for Lincoln, he should like to call the attention of the House still further to what was actually said then, and what was the intention of the House. There could be no doubt that after those debates the public-house interests thoroughly understood what was the position then. They, of course, knew precisely the basis on which the Kennedy decision was arrived at. As Mr. Justice Kennedy then said, after pointing out that the price of the licence would ordinarily depend on brewers' competition—

“This will depend upon the amount of profit which the brewer owner can fairly be expected to make. The evidence must be of profit made ordinarily and normally in the brewing trade.”

There could be no doubt that that idea at any rate was not held by anyone in 1904, and especially was that the case if they looked at the observations of Mr. C. A. Cripps, whose knowledge of the law of arbitration, of course, was perfectly unique. There were one or two quotations from his speeches which were of importance. He said the Bill was not based on the principle of compensation for trade at all, otherwise the amount of compensation might be very large indeed, and the suppression of a large number of public-houses rendered practically impossible. That was precisely what had occurred under the Kennedy judgment. He said—

“Further, they could not have anything in the nature of compensation of a more moderate and restricted form than that in the Bill. In the Bill there was no trade compensation of any kind.”

Even if Mr. Cripps could not be quoted as speaking for the Government, they had a very important declaration by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Dublin University, in which, when the hon. Member for Mansfield said if the matter went to arbitration the question would be left to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, who based their valuation on the takings of the house, the right hon. Gentleman interrupted, and said—

“That is not so.”

It was perfectly clear that the valuation would not be based on the takings of the house, and he believed that view was accepted by the trade. The trade had several compensation cases tested before the Kennedy judgment, and they were at that moment satisfied with the decision of the Board of Inland Revenue and did not quarrel. When the Kennedy judgment was given no one was more surprised at the legal position than the representatives of the brewing interest. If that view had not been held in 1904, he ventured to think that these proposals would have been dismissed in a very summary way. If the Government had had to admit that the system of compensation would be, in the words of Mr. Cripps, “such as would render practically impossible any large reduction of public-houses,” he did not think the Government would have adhered to their clause. The decision of Lord Justice Kennedy had materially influenced the operations of the magistrates with regard to compensation. There was a case in Chelsea where there were three public-houses situated all together. Two of these were in the ownership of one firm of brewers and on closing one of them that firm might have full compensation on the basis of its wholesale profits, whereas it would probably continue to sell in the remaining house as much beer as it had hitherto sold in the two houses. Such cases rendered it extremely difficult for the magistrates to carry out the law. They had had two or three instances given with reference to the assessed value of public-houses upon which the compensation was to be based. He had taken the opportunity of looking into the question of "The Crown," which was one of the public-houses that formed the subject matter of the Kennedy judgment. The compensation payable under the Bill in this case had been stated to be £52. He had, however, tested this figure by means of the information appearing in the report of the case. The assessed value was £23, and he was informed by one of the most eminent and experienced men in regard to assessments in London that it certainly ought to have been valued at £50. The result of that was that if they deducted from those two figures the value of the house which was unlicensed, which was given in the Kennedy judgment as being £18, taking the difference not between £18 and £23, but the difference between £18 and £50, instead of the compensation being £52, as stated in this House on the Second Reading of the Bill, the compensation would be £350, or three times the amount estimated. From that point of view, if the assessment was properly raised, as it should be, there could be little doubt that the displaced publican would see it was a fair compensation. The only point that remained was whether or not this raising of the assessment would take place. It had been pointed out to the Government that the Bill as at present drafted would not ensure this. He thought that so far, at any rate as concerned the particular clause which dealt with the assessment of London, that would have to be amended if they were to carry into effect the scheme of the Government—a scheme whereby the public-houses would be assessed up to their full value.

*MR. YOUNGER (Ayr Burghs) said he was sure the Committee did not desire that any section of the community should be led to think that they could not obtain justice from the present House of Commons. The whole point of the opposition was that the scheme of compensation in this clause was one which in itself was not fair, just, or equitable to the interests which were being assailed by it, particularly having regard to the fact that the money to be provided for the compensation was provided by themselves and not by the State. They had heard a great deal of the question of under-assessment of public-houses. He protested against the brewers being blamed for that; if there was a fault, he thought it lay entirely with Parliament. If they had been lax in not seeing that their valuation laws were good, it was the fault not of the brewers but of the Government. In Scotland the assessments in the main had for a long period been made by independent valuers from Somerset House, and it was a puzzle to him why that had not been done in England. He assured English hon. Members that if they had the chance of discussing a Licensing Bill for Scotland, which he hoped they would not have, they would not be able to say that the public-houses there were not assessed up to the full amount of their monopoly value. He agreed with the hon. Member for Kidderminster in saying that at all events if the brewers had submitted to under-assessment, as most people did, the Government had been equal sinners. They had submitted to the alleged under-assessment of the "Coach and Horses," and nobody heard that they went with their caps in their hands to ask for the valuation to be raised. The Royal Commission appointed on this question was more thorough in its proposals than the present Government. They began by saying that their scheme included in its operation all retail licences—that was, off-licences as well as on-licences—both as contributories to the compensation fund, and as liable to suppression, which they said appeared "both desirable and necessary for the working of the proposal." In discussing the question as to how compensation should be framed, they dealt with the question of basing it on annual value, and said it was tolerably certain that goodwill would not in that case be considered at all. They took the declaratory value, the value of the premises without a licence and the value of the premises with, and they provided that the declaratory value should be taken every seventh year. He wished the advisers of the Government in this matter had really understood the exact position of this matter when advising them.

In a pamphlet the right hon. Member for the Spen Valley said—

“ The Act of 1904 does not say anything about paying compensation for goodwill. What it provides is that the amount to be paid should be a sum equal to the difference between the value of the licensed premises and the value which these premises would bear if they were not licensed premises.”

But, as had been pointed out, this difference in value practically did include it. What they wanted to get at was the market value. He asked, Was it the intention of the Government, in taking away these licences, merely to pay compensation for the monopoly value, and not for the market value? The Government were, he understood, only proposing to pay the monopoly value. The monopoly value, of course, existed, but what would be the value of the monopoly if it were not for the house and the money put into that house to work the business? There would be no value. It only got its value from the fact that somebody provided capital with which to work it. If they only compensated for monopoly they compensated insufficiently, ignoring altogether the question of goodwill and the profits made. It would be derisory compensation if the amount of monopoly value were alone to be considered. It was said that there seemed to be no very great increase of values in recent years. That arose largely from the alleged inefficient state of the valuation law. An important feature, namely, the greatly increased competition which had taken place by the establishment of clubs, had been ignored altogether. There was also at the present time a more severe and acute competition between on-licences and grocers' licences in the spirit trade, and these two factors as well as the weakness of the valuation system had a great deal to do with the somewhat interesting and startling figures which had been adduced in this particular. His complaint was that the compensation proposed to be given was totally insufficient. He believed that in many cases no compensation would be given at all. There were many cases in which the rateable value for income-tax was less than what it would be if the premises were not licensed at all. That seemed to him, therefore, as it seemed to the Commissioners, a perfectly impossible basis on which to found any accurate or fair system for compensating public-houses. The Prime Minister had said that in the case of the sale of one of their houses the Government were obliged to adopt the attitude of Lord Justice Kennedy. He thought the right hon. Gentleman was quite right; he was dealing with public property, and he had to get the best price he could for the public. He did not find any fault with that; but he did find fault that they refused to adopt the system of the Inland Revenue authorities, whose action had been frequently alluded to in this connection. The Chancellor of the Exchequer made a long speech the other night on the valuation of licensed property for the purpose of the death duties. He was interested to notice that on the day after a solicitor in Tunbridge Wells stated that he had recently had occasion in the interest of a client to settle the value of a public-house with the Inland Revenue authorities for death duties, and acting upon the speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer he suggested that fourteen years purchase was all to which they were entitled. The Inland Revenue authorities laughed at him, and the house was ultimately valued at twenty-seven years purchase. It appeared, therefore, that the Inland Revenue Commissioners had not adopted the scheme of valuation which was so much commended by hon. Members on the other side. On the contrary they followed a method which at all events produced for the State in the way of death duties a value far above what any one who was to be dispossessed under this Bill had asked to be paid. He hoped this debate would lead the Government to see that some further serious consideration required to be given to the question of compensation. They were proposing to place an extremely unfair burden on certain parties, and that largely from the fact that they were establishing a national fund instead of a local fund. The conditions which justified the 1904 proposals did not exist here, and he hoped that in this matter the Government would change their minds for the better as they had changed their minds for the worse in other parts of the Bill.

MR. LUPTON (Lincolnshire, Skefford) said the Committee had heard a great from the opposite side for ard to the amount of com-be paid for public-houses.

a very fine thing, but it
's pleasant to the recipient.
inded of what the great said—

nan after his desert, and who hipping?"

a dealing with this matter ish the Committee to apply e to licence-holders. He Committee ought rather to at the licence-holders themed, and what the Committee lly, he did not say generously, er that this business might be aving heard all the arguments gainst this particular scheme nsation, he had come to the that there was no use trying the question by any process of to what the exact rate of com-should be. They had to what was the compensation he parties to be compensated accept, so long as the demand was not too large. He thought should be inserted in this clause would have the effect of giving ner of the licensed premises the value. The scheme of compen-according to Schedule A had a many advantages. It should be ned with arrangements for the g of the assessments, and in that it would be a good thing for the ue of the Exchequer and of the authorities. If it were found that assessment under Schedule A was ficient, the owner of the house ld be penalised by having the unt payable for compensation reed accordingly. That would make ice-holders careful to see that they e properly assessed, with the result t the rating authorities would get advantage of fair assessments on the mises according to their value. The ject of the Bill was to bring about great result for the good of the com-unity, and it would be a great pity if ey did anything which would cause unity between different classes. It ould not pay, from the point of view f the Liberal Party, to set the liquor rade against them. He did not see why they should fight over the amount of compensation to be paid at all so long as those engaged in the trade were willing to pay a larger amount than that proposed. The drink traffic represented the stomach of the nation, and was far more powerful than the head. He presumed that the trade only wanted their money back, and with ordinary business prudence the Treasury Bench ought to be able to devise a satisfactory scheme of settlement between this and the Report stage. At the same time he wished to warn the brewers that the less they cried for justice, the better it would be for them in the end.

SIR F. BANBURY (City of London) said that if temperance reformers desired to take away the property of brewers in order to advance the cause of temperance, that could be done by paying fair compensation. He understood the hon. Member opposite to say that the brewers did not anticipate the Kennedy judgment would be what it was. He was not himself a brewer and he had no means of knowing what they anticipated, but he would point out that the Kennedy judgment should have as much weight as the judgment in the case of Sharpe v.
Wakefield, of which they heard so much from hon. Gentlemen on the other side of the House. The Kennedy judgment did not suit them; they said that the brewers did not expect it, that the late Government did not intend it, and they argued consequently that no attention should be paid to it. It appeared to him that the Kennedy judgment was in accordance with ordinary justice and common sense, and that it ought to be carried out. If the Government were going to take away a man's business, they ought not to apply a hard-and-fast rule, but should investigate each case upon its merits, and give judgment accordingly. He had the honour of being a Member of this House at the time the 1904 Act was passed. He voted for it with the hope that a judgment similar to the Kennedy judgment would be given. He did not know whether there was any difference between restaurants and public-houses under the Bill. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman opposite would tell him.

THE UNDER-SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT: (Mr. HERBERT SAMUEL, Yorkshire, Cleveland): They will not be compulsorily reduced. It is in the discretion of the magistrates.

SIR F. BANBURY said he did not think that the Under-Secretary was quite clear on the subject; but he presumed that restaurants would be treated in the same way as ordinary on-licences. He would take the following case, the accuracy of which he could guarantee. A house in London was let at £3,000 a year as offices. Alterations were made upon it to adapt it for a restaurant; and it was thereafter let on lease for sixty years with a licence transferred from a licensed house in the same street, belonging to the same freeholder, at £4,000 a year. The annual value of the property without licence was, therefore, clearly £3,000 a year. The lease was granted ten years ago. If therefore the licence was taken away at the end of fourteen years from now the leaseholder would have to lose £1,000 a year for thirty-six years. If the licence was taken away in a year's time the compensation would only be such a sum as was the value of the difference between the annual value with the licence and the annual value without the licence, so that he would get no compensation for the loss of his business; he would only be recouped the loss in rent for thirteen years; and would then still have to lose £1,000 a year for thirty-six years. Here was another case. A licensed victualler had a house on lease with an unexpired term of thirty-two years. He invested of his own money in that house £16,000, and in addition £6,500 which he obtained on loan from the bank. On the Second Reading of this Bill the bank called in the loan of £6,500, and an old friend of the family lent the man £6,500 to replace the loan called in by the bank. The whole amount of money in that house was therefore £22,500; and the compensation under the Bill would only amount to £5,800. He did not want to make a point of the assessment, because he failed to see what assessment had to do with the matter at all. They all knew that in London assessments were conducted in a business-like and proper manner, but that was not the case in the country. He knew of a case in which the overseers had kept on assessing a house which had been pulled down for twenty years. What then had that to do with the brewer? It was no fault of the brewer. He would ask the Committee to think seriously before passing this particular clause. It might be right or it might be wrong to abolish licences; but in any case it must be a self-evident proposition that if they were going to abolish licences in the interests of the country, the country ought to see that clear compensation was given to the brewer. He himself would go further; he thought the compensation should come from the public who were going to be benefited by the Bill, according to the argument of hon. Members opposite. As, however, it was impossible for the public to pay the compensation, he thought provision ought at least to be made whereby the brewers by themselves might arrange a fair compensation in the event of a fairly conducted business being closed.

*MR. RIDSDALE (Brighton) said he should like to discuss this subsection from a point of view which had not yet been put before the Committee; that was to say from the point of view of machinery rather than that of the basis of compensation. Any licence that was suppressed during the first year of the reduction period would be compensated according to the term of the reduction period still unexpired, so that the holder would get thirteen years compensation. If they followed that up all the series of years during the reduction period they finally came to the case at the end of it in which the licensee who was reduced during the last year of the period of fourteen years got no compensation at all. That was obviously an inequitable proposition, and he was perfectly certain it must have occurred to the Government that this subsection must be recast, because they had introduced into Clause 3 a new principle. Under Clause 3 as drafted the reduction period and the time-limit were coterminous, but the Prime Minister had given the House to understand that at the expiration of the reduction period there would be a time of grace of seven years before attempt would be made to exact the poly value out of the licensees who red. Let the Committee look at the tion of a man who was suppressed in last year. He would get nothing, the man who was perhaps very little er than himself so far as the needs the neighbourhood were concerned eeded in lasting over the reduction od, and got into that seven years of ce. His compensation levy stopped, he was subjected only to the inary demands which a licensee had pay at the present time and he a probable seven years run of business. Surely they could not that there was any equitable treat-nt in those two cases. The man who s suppressed in the first year of the uction period, who got thirteen years npensation, was admittedly a man o had set up a house and run a siness which had been a redundant siness carried on to the detriment of s neighbours, for those responsible for oming the scheme of reduction had lected him as the man to be suppressed the earliest possible moment. Surely ey were not going to give him thirteen ars compensation and give the an, whose licence was suppressed the end of the period, having set p a house that served the needs of is immediate neighbours—who on the hole had conferred good rather than evil n those neighbours—no compensation t all. He really submitted that that art of the scheme required redrafting, nd he had put down an Amendment to meet that case. It was quite a simple plan hich could be adopted, without cutting t the scheme of the Bill, because happily he Prime Minister had instituted a even years period of grace which was n integral part of the reduction period. Therefore if they adopted a sliding scale nd conferred on the licensee who was uppressed in addition to the amount of money he would get proportionate to the term of years unexpired, an amount equivalent to half the number of years which his tenancy had already run, they would get a graduated scheme which was fair and equitable. He would give a couple of instances. Take a case in which the licence was suppressed after two years with twelve years of the reduction period still unexpired. Under the Government's scheme that man would get twelve years compensation. He suggested that he should get twelve years compensation plus two periods of six months in respect of the two years licence he had already enjoyed. That would give him thirteen years compensation altogether. If a man had eight years of the reduction period expired and six years still to run, under the Government scheme he would get six years compensation. He suggested that he should get six years compensation plus eight periods of six months or four years, making ten years compensation in all. Take the case of a man who had thirteen years expired and one year to run. Under the Government scheme he would get only one year's compensation. He suggested that he should have one year's compensation plus thirteen periods of six months or six and a half years, which would give him seven and a half years compensation in all. Take the last case of all, the man whose whole fourteen years had run, who had been paying the compensation levy the whole time, and whose licence was suppressed, but who had just failed to enter the period of seven years grace. Under the Government Bill he got nothing, but under his suggested Amendment he would get seven years compensation. He very humbly submitted that if the Government could see their way to introduce that principle into their clause it would make the Bill much more equitable and fair all round.

MR. LYTTELTON (St. George's, Hanover Square) said he would press most strongly upon the Under-Secretary the absolute necessity of meeting the arguments which had been directed against the clause unless the Bill were to be a palpable absurdity. It was manifestly absurd that at the end of fourteen years a man who in all likelihood was a deserving man, who had paid the compensation levy for fourteen years, and whose house by hypothesis was more desirable than another, should receive nothing; whereas a man whose licence was suppressed at the beginning of the fourteen years, whose house probably was undesirable and clearly redundant, should receive substantial compensation. The arguments that day on the other side of the House, with the exception of the Member who had last spoken, had been somewhat of a technical character. He wanted to remind the Committee, in the first instance, that whatever the basis of the compensation was, it was the trade that had to pay it. It was clear that the reason for the alteration in the compensation scale levy was not that it was an unjust levy, but that it was the policy of hon. Members opposite to accelerate the speed of reduction in the number of public-houses. That might be the policy. But if it was the policy of hon. Members to accelerate the speed of reduction, surely that ought to be done upon just and fair terms. He believed the Committee were almost throughout agreeable to that. Therefore, apart from technicalities, let them go to the heart and substance of the matter, and ask themselves whether this was a true, honest, and fair way of ascertaining the compensation due to those whose licences were reduced without misconduct. Supposing any hon. Member was called upon to value property. Take the simplest case of valuing not a public-house, but an ordinary house. Obviously, the way he would proceed would be to ascertain its rental; whether it was in a good neighbourhood; whether it was in a town which was likely to maintain its position; and according as these questions were answered affirmatively or negatively he would apply a low or a high rate of purchase. If it was a very good property he would apply twenty or twenty-five years purchase; if it was a bad property it would come down to as low as nine or eight. That particular method of ascertaining value, and what it would be fair to pay to an owner if he were dispossessed, was not open to a valuer of "tied" houses, because in those cases the rental was compounded of two things, a money payment and an onerous obligation into which the tenant entered to buy his beer from a certain brewer at a certain price. Therefore, the owner who was a brewer, in that case received for the house which was his property, a rental in money and a covenant to buy from him an article from which he made a substantial profit. The true compensation in that case, therefore, and no one could deny it—there was no escape from it—was first the cash value, and next the value to the brewer of the retail trade which he sold to the publican, which, of course, was a very much larger sum than the rental itself. What hon. Members desired to do in this case was to get rid of that second element of value altogether, but really it was not arguable. They desired to say that where a publican had a price of £100 to pay, and where he had under the terms of the "tied" covenant to pay £200 a year more—that was to say, where the total value of the premises to him was £300 a year—they were going to say and, as he understood the Government proposal was, that the value should be £100 a year instead of £300. That really was a proposal which he ventured to think was preposterous, and he could not think that hon. Members understood it before they made it. It was perfectly true that Lord Justice Kennedy himself had said that in the absence of rental for premises such as this, he had found it absolutely impossible to arrive definitely at the value of the house. But when they had a figure, very often a very small figure for the rental, and a large figure for "tie," he said they must take both those figures before they could arrive at what the true value of the property was, either to the publican or to the brewer. He should like to say that that was an uncontestable proposal. He had taken part in very many arbitration cases, and it had never been and never could be disputed that when they had to deal with first the property consisting of bricks and mortar and land, and then a trade carried on on the property, to which that property was peculiarly adapted, they must have regard to the property as a whole as enhanced by the trade carried on before they could ascertain what the value was or might be to the owner or tenant. The hon. Members for Lincoln and Huddersfield, to whose speeches he had listened with great interest, impeached, as he understood, the very simple principles which he had been venturing to submit to the House, not upon the authority of the Kennedy judgment but upon the authority of universal practice which that judgment did not go beyond.

How had the hon. Members sought to impugn these conclusions which seemed to him to be so clear? They had said that such a construction as this of the 1904 compensation clause was clearly against the intention of the authors of the Act. It would have been expected that to have established and maintained such a proposal as that they would at least have been able to quote some words from the late Prime Minister bearing out any such intention. No such words had been submitted, and he would only say that he would himself protest against the idea that anybody except the Prime Minister and the Member actually in charge of the Bill could be considered an authority as to what the intentions of the Bill were. Since his right hon. friend the late Home Secretary had been quoted in connection with the proposition laid down, he would read his answer to the present Minister for Education. The latter right hon. Gentleman asked whether steps would be taken to introduce in another place an Amendment to the Licensing Bill granting to the licensee compensation for goodwill. The late Home Secretary having answered that Question, the present Minister of Education inquired—

“Is there a provision in the Bill giving compensation for goodwill?”

And Mr. Akers-Douglas replied—

“It must be an element in the question which the Committee have to consider.”

And how could one possibly consider the question of goodwill without this element? There they had the whole matter as he thought. How could they possibly consider the value of the goodwill of a person carrying on business, without some regard to the profits he had earned?

MR. SHERWELL: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman one question. Is he referring to the goodwill of the brewer or manufacturer or the goodwill of the retailer?

MR. LYTTLETON: I am referring to the goodwill of both. The proposal of the hon. Member for Lincoln was that the intention of the authors of the Act was to exclude the elements of profit altogether.

*MR. CHARLES ROBERTS: I am sorry to interrupt but that was not my meaning. What I did mean was that I thought it was the intention of the authors of the Act to exclude consideration of the wholesale profits of the brewer except in so far as the monopoly profits derived from the licence increased the real rent which a hypothetical tenant would pay. That is the only way in which the wholesale profits should be taken into account.

MR. LYTTLETON said he only desired to arrive at the hon. Gentleman's real meaning, but when they had to consider, as they had to consider here, what the value of the licensed premises was to the owner as well as to the tenant, how could they possibly, in common sense apart from the law, divorce the worth to the owner measured by the “tie” covenant in the deed between the parties. The hon. Member knew as well as he did that the brewer was perfectly ready to take £25 rent, looking at the £200 or £250 a year profit which he might make upon the beer. If they had to consider that question, and it was admitted that they had in order to estimate the value of the premises to the owner, was it possible to exclude the item, and how was it possible to exclude the consideration of the profits which lay at the root of the whole matter? Then the hon. Member for Huddersfield impeached this judgment on the ground that Lord Justice Kennedy had failed to distinguish between what the hon. Member called the precarious property—which was subject to the will of the justices not to be renewed—and the more assured property of the ante-1869 beer-house, and he said a distinction of only one year's purchase was made between the two. The hon. Member would forgive him for saying, however, that if he had had more experience in this matter he would have known that very often the ante-1869 beer-houses were of the poorest and most miserable class of property. They were scarcely worth a year's purchase of their profits. Others were worth more because they did a good trade. But those who did a bad trade were not worth more than one year's purchase as compared with the ordinary public-house. But the hon. Member sought to derive from that argument an inference that Lord Justice Kennedy had treated the ordinary public-houses as if they were freehold; but no such deduction could, he thought, be made. He should like to call attention to the fact that there was a passage in the 1904 Act, the general effect of which was that nothing that ensued from the passage of that Act should be deemed to enhance the value of the licensed property after its passing. They had, therefore, it was said, when they were following up those words for the purposes of compensation, to consider the pre-1904 period. He accepted that, but did not see how that had really anything to do with the present case. It was perfectly obvious that the temperance party was quite sufficiently energetic and wealthy to make that clear in a Court of law if it was not clear now. He thought it was perfectly clear. He did not think there could be any argument in regard to it under the Act. He thought that the hon. Member, whose great knowledge on this subject everybody cheerfully recognised, would agree that it had no bearing on this case. Nobody except a few persons on the other side of the House would wish to do injustice to those whom they reduced during the fourteen years, and that feeling which ought to commend itself to all was surely rendered more palatable to those who entertained a strong temperance opinion by the fact that the justice to be given to them would be paid for by the trade to which they belonged. There were only two other arguments to which he would very briefly refer in conclusion. Of course there were certain differences of opinion as to the amount of variance between the Government proposals and the 1904 proposals, as to the compensation which would be payable. He thought it ranged from one-third to one-eighth, but great as was the zeal of the hon. Member, he did not dispute that at least one-third would be the difference. There was one other objection raised against the present basis, and that was its inconsistency with assessments. That was dealt with most fully by his hon. friend the Member for Ayr, who said that the Majority Report of the Royal Commission showed that the assessments for rateable purposes had nothing to do with the question of compensation at all—that such a contention was inadmissible. Anybody who had had anything to do with compensation law knew that perfectly well. It was a sort of last resource for a counsel in a desperate position to set up, but every arbitrator in the Kingdom knew that the argument was totally irrelevant and ignorant. The passage to which he referred was to be found at page 53 of the Report of the Royal Commission of which Lord Peel was the Chairman, in which it was proposed that the taxation of licensed premises should be on the basis of assessment. He had now, he thought, disposed of, or he had endeavoured to dispose of, the whole of the five objections raised by the hon. Member opposite. The real fact was that the Government were attempting to accelerate the reduction of licences by paying very much less than the interests were worth. They were proposing to pay merely for the value, not of the trader's interest in the premises or of the premises themselves, but of the exclusive right which his licence gave him. A moment's consideration would show that that was to give him much less than his due. Take a place in which there was only one public-house, in which there was room for only one public-house, and take it that that public-house was carried on by an excellent man in an excellent way. In the course of thirty years he had established, as everybody would admit, a strong claim for goodwill—there was the strongest presumption that the old customer would resort to the old place—which was worth, let them say, £500. What was the value of the exclusive power which his licence gave him? It was probably worth nothing, because nobody would be fool enough to come into such a place with a man so entrenched against him, there being, by hypothesis, no room for more than one public-house. In that position of things, under the Government's proposals, as he read them, they would not pay this man for his trade interest nor for his goodwill. They would pay him which was, as he thought, —the power of excluding others would come.

ERT SAMUEL: The speech we have just listened from the gentleman is an indictment of this clause and a plea for its removal from the Bill. It must be once that hon. and right hon. members opposite have a perfect answer: "Granted you are pro-ter the licensing law, and going to accelerate the reductions, you leave the present system of compensation untouched? Why have you done that at all, seeing that the trade compensation levy and is in line with the system of compensation is?" That is a question to receive a full reply. We are sums which are now being paid for what is colloquially known as the Kennedy judgment, as grossly excessive. That judgment was received by the whole of the liquor trade with, to say the least, mingled gratification and surprise, and with equal dismay among the benches throughout the House. Those hon. Members who have been as licensing justices know what that judgment was to the attempts they were making to secure a proper regulation of licensed houses. Not only unexpected by them, but I venture to assert and emphasise the argument, strongly put by the hon. Member for London in his able speech, that compensation on this basis was wholly unexpected by the framers of the Act of 1904. The basis of compensation awarded by Justice Kennedy included an element of brewers' profits which was no part of the system contemplated by them. So that as the actual value of the licences is ascertained, the sums now paid are in excess of those which were quoted in the House by the then Ministers as the probable values of the houses to be suppressed. The right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down, then the Secretary of State for the Colonies, when it was asserted by the then Opposition that the compensation levied would be only sufficient to pay for a small number of houses, and that the licensed value of those houses must be taken at a higher figure, said that the hon. Member for the Spen Valley in taking the figure at £1,000 in the towns and £600 in the country had taken a figure which was preposterously large. What has been the result? Taking the whole of the country, town and country together, in the first year after the Act of 1904 the average sum paid for licences was £614. In 1906, in the summer of which year the Kennedy judgment was delivered, the average amount paid was £698. But in 1907, when the Kennedy judgment was having its full effect, the average amount paid had risen from £614, which it was in 1905, to £921. In the towns, of course, it was far higher than that. The right hon. Gentleman also said, in the same debate, that—

"For example, Liverpool estimates that the sum for its contribution will be £35,000 a year, and that the value of the licences likely to be extinguished would be £500."

As a matter of fact, the sums which the licensing magistrates of Liverpool had to pay, owing to the Kennedy judgment, last year averaged, on thirty-six houses, £1,068, a sum which the right hon. Gentleman in 1904 declared was preposterously large. Other Gentlemen supporting the then Government gave estimates of a similar kind. One Gentleman, then one of the Members for York, who was well known as one of the inspirers of the Act of 1904, Mr. Butcher, asserted that the figure of £1,000, which had been suggested for Birmingham, was absurdly large—that £500 would be nearer the mark as the average sum payable for compensation in Birmingham. I have had the figures for Birmingham taken out, and I find that last year, on an average of twenty-six houses, the sum which had to be paid was not £500 but £1,679. Mr. Lloyd Wharton, then a Member of the House and a leading supporter of the party opposite, also put £500 as a reasonable sum. In another place, Lord Lansdowne stated that the sum available would be £1,200,000, and that that would be sufficient, it was estimated, to suppress between 1,500 and 2,000 licences, which showed that he estimated a sum of between £600 and £800 per licence, while Lord Salisbury put the estimate still lower—at about £400 per licence to begin with. Comparing these figures with those which had actually to be paid under the Kennedy judgment, we are entitled to say that the valuation of licences is far in excess of that which the House was led to anticipate would be the sums payable under the Act of 1904. But it is said, supposing that the owners of these houses are getting more than the real value, why should this House take the trouble to interfere. The trade pays and the trade is satisfied. Why not leave it alone? The answer is simple. We hold with both the Majority and Minority Reports of the Royal Commission that a large reduction in the number of licences is essential in the public interest. That cannot be effected unless we can increase the compensation levy, which we are unwilling to do, or else pay compensation on the fair value of the licence and not on the valuation which is now paid, and which we assert to be an inflated valuation. That is the reason why we cannot leave it alone simply on the ground that the trade paid and the trade alone suffered. I come to the question of the assessment of the value itself. The question of valuation is an intricate one. There are three elements to be considered; first there is the basis of valuation, the annual licence value, how are you to assess that? Then there is the number of years purchase; and, thirdly, the position of the tenant which ought to be considered—the allocation of the compensation, whatever it may be that is to be paid, among to the several parties interested. As to the annual licence value, the subject of compensation is the value of the premises as a place of retail trade, and not the value of the premises as an outlet for wholesale trade. If the licence is suppressed it is probable that some of the trade will be diverted into other channels, though we hope and believe not the whole of it. To put the case very simply, if the licence of a free house which is being supplied by different brewery companies is suppressed by the action of the law, ought the compensation to be paid include the loss which would fall upon the brewers which have previously been supplying it?

MR. LYTTTELTON: The brewer has nothing to do with it. The tenant there has the power of letting to another tenant and selling to him the right of retailing, and that right would always be enhanced in value by the fact that the brewers would bid against him for the possession of the house, and as such would make up the market value.

*MR. HERBERT SAMUEL: The first part of the right hon. Gentleman's reply fully answers my question. Nobody would propose—certainly it cannot be read into the Kennedy judgment—that where a free house is suppressed the brewer has any right to receive any compensation at all. The question is: How much should be paid in the case of a tied house? The right hon. Gentleman says it is an incontestable proposition that the rental of such a house does not represent the value of the licence. Nobody would contest that for a moment, and if one only considered the rent in arriving at the basis of compensation, one would obviously be committing an injustice. But we are not doing that. We are taking the Schedule A value of the house, which is a very different thing. The Commissioners of Income-Tax would never accept the rental value of a tied house as representing the Schedule A value of that house unless they were convinced that the rent was the only consideration for the lease. Where there is a further consideration as there is in the case of a tied house—namely, that the lessee shall buy his beer at a certain price of a certain brewer—there is another element to take into consideration; and the Inland Revenue Commissioners would take that consideration into account, and, in assessing the house to Schedule A, would value it at a figure considerably above the rental. That completely answers the question as to rental. The question then arises whether the Schedule A value as so defined is a fair representation of the licence value of the house. If that is disputed, if it is said that the income-tax value is not the real value, the argument must lead inevitably to the conclusion that the house is paying too little to the income-tax. I assert hon. Members opposite are on the horns of a dilemma; either they must admit that the income-tax valuation is a fair one, or if they do not it leads to the inevitable conclusion that publicans and brewers pay less than their share of taxation.

AN HON. MEMBER: Goodwill

*MR. HERBERT SAMUEL: It is said that the question of goodwill must be taken into consideration, and the right hon. Gentleman has instanced the case of a public-house which was the only one in a certain place, where the publican by his energy and civility has built up a valuable business. The illustration is not a fortunate one, for, if it is the only public-house in the place, it certainly will not be suppressed.

MR. LYTTELTON suggested that it might be suppressed in Wales.

*MR. HERBERT SAMUEL: That is, I admit, conceivable, but I did not think the right hon. Gentleman limited his illustration to the case of Wales. In dealing with goodwill you must define what you mean by goodwill. Goodwill may be of different kinds. It may be personal goodwill or what may be called local goodwill. It may attach to the person managing the business, or it may attach to the premises as being peculiarly suited to the particular business carried on there. With regard to personal goodwill, we contend that that is covered by the extra compensation—to which the right hon. Gentleman made no reference—payable to the tenant of the house—the actual licence-holder. Personal goodwill does not belong to the owner of the house. It is the creation of the tenant, and he will receive compensation under the provisions of the clause. The local goodwill attaching to the premises is unquestionably included in the Schedule A valuation. The right hon. Gentleman the former Home Secretary was quite right in saying that the Act of 1904, whether as interpreted by the Inland Revenue Commissioners or by Mr. Justice Kennedy, in either case included an element of goodwill, and the contention of the Government is that it is included in the Bill. Whether you look at it from the point of view of goodwill or any other, the Government assumes that, in the case of a tied house, the Schedule A valuation is a fair and reasonable basis for compensation, and that was the view of the Inland Revenue Commissioners, on whom is placed by the Act of 1904 the duty of interpreting the terms of that Act. The proposal in the Bill is the very proposal adopted by the Commissioners under the Act of 1904, as is shown by the memorandum issued by them upon this question. It was altered by Mr. Justice Kennedy, who placed a different interpretation upon the somewhat obscure words of the section. I now come to the second point. Having fixed the annual licence value, how many years purchase is a fair sum to pay? When the licence value is regarded practically as a freehold, as it was under the Act of 1904, of course freehold value had to be paid, and the period of twenty-five years purchase was not altogether unreasonable.

MR. LYTTELTON: Not of the licence.

*MR. HERBERT SAMUEL: Of the whole value of the premises under Schedule A. Here again we have to ask ourselves what it is that has to be compensated. Under the operation of the time-limit clause the subject of compensation is the monopoly value which the licence-holder would retain if his licence were not suppressed but allowed to run on until the monopoly value was taken from him. If the licence is taken at the beginning of the period, he will be entitled to a considerable amount, because the licence would have had a long time to run; if taken at the end of the period, the compensation ought to be very much less. Hon. Members say that it is very hard on a man whose licence is taken away at the end of the period, after he has paid the compensation levy all those years, that the more he has paid the less he should get in the end. That is a complete misunderstanding of the position of the licence-holder under the operation of the time-limit clause. He was in a similar position to that of a leaseholder paying rent for a given number of years. Let us suppose it is a fourteen years lease. If his lease is taken away for any reason at the beginning of the fourteen years he is entitled to a considerable sum in compensation, but if it runs on for ten years and he has paid rent all the time he will only get compensation for the four years that remain which will be much less. Then I take another illustration from insurance. A man who has insured himself against accident and has paid year after year without having any accident receives nothing. He is paying for his neighbour who suffers from any accident, and at the end of twenty years he might die of disease and get nothing from his accident insurance. We have been asked to-day by more than one hon. Member whether the extension of the time-limit by seven years does not necessitate an alteration in the provisions of this clause. The right hon. Gentleman opposite has said that it would be obviously unjust in the case of a man compensated in the fourteenth year only to pay him one year's purchase, while in the case of a man who ran over the fourteen years he would be allowed in all probability to go on for a further seven years and without his paying the monopoly value. There is that injustice in the Bill if the clause remains as it is, but it is the intention of the Government on the Report stage to move certain alterations consequential on the addition of the seven years—[Ironical Opposition cheers]—we could not possibly insert them at the present stage, for the simple reason that the proposal for the seven years extension has not yet been embodied in the Bill.

MR. AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN (Worcestershire, E.): Can the hon. Gentleman indicate roughly what will be the consequential Amendment of which he has spoken?

*MR. HERBERT SAMUEL: An additional number of years purchase for those licences which are suppressed.

MR. AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN: To run during the subsequent seven years?

*MR. HERBERT SAMUEL: That does not arise at all. We are dealing with those houses that are suppressed as part of the reduction during the reduction period. It is compensation with regard to those houses that we are now considering.

MR. AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN: In order to get the matter clear, do I understand that a man who is suppressed at the beginning of the time-limit will be compensated on the basis that his licence has fourteen plus seven years to run? When a man's licence is taken away at the end of fourteen years, is there no compensation at all, or is his proportion of the seven years extension added to the time-limit?

*MR. HERBERT SAMUEL: No licence will be taken away as part of the reduction scheme after the fourteen years, but during the fourteenth year a man will get compensation in respect of what he loses, which is not merely his monopoly value for one year, but the prospect of seven years free from monopoly charge. It is only just and equitable that he should receive a sum in respect of that. I now turn to the last point upon this matter and that is the licensee's share of the compensation money. The Act of 1904 provides that having determined what is the fair licence value of the premises to the owner it is to be divided between the owner and the licensee. That has always seemed to me to be unfair to both parties; it is unfair to the owner, because if the award is the fair value of the premises to the owner it ought to go to him; and it is unjust to the licensee, because there might be a case in which the owner's value was comparatively small, while the licensee might be making a very fair living. The sum at the disposal of the compensating authority for the benefit of the licensee, would, in that case, be exceedingly small. Under the present law the compensation paid to the licence-holder is frequently most inadequate. This class of man who has to take this special risk and who is represented by hon. Members opposite to have a special claim on such compensation as ought to be provided, has been somewhat unfairly treated by the Act of 1904. We propose that the sum payable to the licence-holder shall be a completely separate charge on the compensation fund, that what is assessed as being the fair value to the owner should be paid to the owner, and that separately the Inland Revenue Commissioners shall be required to assess the actual loss sustained by the licence-holder by the loss of his business. There appears on the Amendment Paper one or two comparatively small Amendments in the name of my hon. and learned friend the Solicitor-General relating to this provision. It is intended that in no case shall the licence-holder receive less than a year's profit for his business. The Act of 1904 provided that in no case should the tenant receive less than this one year's purchase. That was not originally inserted in this Bill because it was thought to be superfluous, but since some doubt has arisen on the point we have determined to ask the Committee to insert words making it clear that in no case should the publican receive less than one year's purchase. It has been pointed out also that the words of the clause might not be held to include a paid manager who lost his employment; to make it clear that he is equally entitled to compensation with other licence-holders my hon. and learned friend will insert words to that effect. Thirdly, a burdensome agreement might be required from publicans, contracting themselves out of the intention of this clause that they should receive separate compensation. We shall insert words to the effect that a tenant shall receive the compensation the law intends him to have, any agreement to the contrary notwithstanding. I come now to the special case of the ante-1869 beerhouses. We are told that whatever we may say with regard to ordinary public-houses, we have no right to impose these conditions on the ante-1869 beerhouses that had a statutory security. They, at all events, are not working under Sharpe v. Wakefield conditions, but have a right to their licences which we are now taking away at the end of the period without any compensation and with only a diminishing compensation during the period. What are the facts? The Act of 1869 did not confer a privilege on these houses, but limited a privilege already existing. Under the Act of 1830 Parliament rashly threw open the beer trade to any one who chose to pay for an Excise licence at the cost of two guineas, free from all control by the justices. Six months after the passing of that Act 24,000 beerhouses were opened, and in eight years 45,000 were opened. There was an immense increase in the consumption of drink, and this was indeed one of the most striking instances of the degree to which facilities for drinking give rise to intemperance. Many attempts were made in Parliament to undo this blunder, but not until 1869 was an Act passed which, not completely, but partially, for the first time, brought these houses under the control of the justices. It said that they might be suppressed for the misconduct of the licence-holder or on account of the unsuitability of the premises, but were not to be suppressed for other reasons. If hon. Members say that the Government has no right to put these houses into their scheme on the same footing as other houses, I ask what right had Parliament in 1869 to bring under the control of the justices licences which in 1830 were granted free from all control. The next incident in the history of these houses was in 1879, when a Committee of the House of Lords, considering the drink question, recommended that they should be assimilated to other public-houses for all purposes without compensation. As I have said in a previous debate that was not the resolution of any revolutionary or confiscatory tribunal. In 1882 a Bill was introduced by the then Mr. Ritchie, who was no enemy of the trade, bringing under the complete control of the justices for all purposes the ante-1869 "off" beerhouses. If it is a monstrous breach of Parliamentary guarantee for the Government to bring them under this Bill, how can they defend the action of Mr. Ritchie and the Parliament of that day in doing that very thing? The next and, up to this year, the last chapter in the history was the Act of 1904, which for the purpose of reduction assimilated these houses to the other public-houses and repealed the section of the Act of 1869 which preserved to them a part of their ancient privileges. These beerhouses did not in 1904 run any risk of suppression by the magistrates except for misconduct or unsuitability of premises, yet the right hon. Gentleman required them to pay the same compensation levy as other houses. [Mr. A. J. BALFOUR dissented.] Surely that was the effect of the Act of 1904? The right hon. Gentleman gave the justices the power to suppress them—with compensation certainly, but he required these houses to pay a compensation levy to protect themselves against the risk he imposed upon them, and which they had never previously run. If the Government's proposal is a breach of a Parliamentary guarantee, surely the right hon. Gentleman's proposal was equally so, and is equally to be condemned? It will not be until the year 1930, until the twenty-one years has run out, that full control will be obtained over the ante-1869 houses, and it will have taken 100 years to undo the error committed by Parliament in 1830. Surely it cannot be said that an act once done by Parliament is never to be undone, and that the State is never to have control over these houses. My last point is this. We have had in connection with these compensation proposals innumerable sets of figures sent to Members of Parliament and issued in the Press, showing what will be the compensation payable under this Bill in contrast with the estimated market value of the licences. We have had long sets of tables estimating the market value at £1,000, £2,000, or £3,000, or whatever it may be, and the compensation payable under the Bill at £50, £60, £70, or whatever figure the fancy of the compilers may suggest. There are three reasons why those figures are all totally unreliable. In the first place they cannot be accepted because no statement is made as to the method by which the estimated value of the licences is arrived at. We do not know whether they merely represent the cost value of the licence—a notoriously unsafe system to go on; and we are never told who has estimated the value and by what process the figures are arrived at. Secondly, all these figures with regard to the compensation payable under the Bill presume that compensation will be paid on the basis of the present income-tax assessment of these houses. As we all know, the present income-tax assessment is often much too low. The hon. Member for the Ayr Burghs with that candour which always characterises him did not deny there are cases and perhaps numerous cases in which the income-tax assessment is too low.

MR. YOUNGER: I was careful to say in England and not Scotland.

*MR. HERBERT SAMUEL: This Bill only applies to England. It is a remarkable thing that the assessment is often put at a very different figure when a man has to receive on it from the figure at which it is put when he has to pay on it, and

Mr. Herbert Samuel

I have no doubt that when the Bill comes into operation the assessments will gradually, but certainly, rise to their fair and proper figures, and an incidental and adventitious, but none the less desirable, result will be that the Revenue will correspondingly gain. The figures laid before the country make no allowance for this. They do not embody the probable increase in the Schedule A valuations which will follow the passage of this Bill. Thirdly, and perhaps this is the most important point of all, these figures make no reference whatever to the most important words in Clause 10 which provide that to the ordinary valuation based upon the Schedule A value of the house, such sum as the Commissioners of Inland Revenue think just shall be added for the value of the premises to the actual holder of the licence. When all these considerations are taken into account, I think we may disregard in toto these long tables of figures. With the Amendments already announced and foreshadowed in this clause, the Government adheres to it as a reasonable and equitable solution of the problem with which it deals.

MR. BOWLES (Lambeth, Norwood) said the conditions under which they had been discussing the Bill were such as, in his opinion, were likely to render the House of Commons ridiculous in the eyes of the country. They were certainly such as had prevented them from discussing, as they ought to have discussed, many vital points in the machinery of the Bill. The Committee was therefore very much to be congratulated on the fact that by the arrangement to which they had consented they had at least been able to make some real inquiry into the true meaning and effect of the Government's proposals so far as they regarded compensation. The Amendment raised a question of very great importance, because upon it they were really able to gauge in what spirit and with what underlying motive hon. Gentlemen opposite were supporting the Bill. The question here was not a question of politics or even of temperance; the main pillars of the Bill—the compulsory reduction of licences, local option, and the time-limit—had been passed, and the sole question of considerable importance which remained in what spirit and temper the Government and hon. Gentlemen opposite intended to deal with the interests of those affected by the measure. So far as he had been able to observe all through the Bill, and to everyone, with one or two exceptions, who had spoken had agreed for various reasons and on different grounds that the subsection as it stood needed to be must receive very serious consideration; and for his part, having carefully considered the matter, he did not see how it could be seriously denied that it was unjust and unfair. The question was a simple one. It was whether, in assessing the compensation to be paid, they ought to proceed upon the market value of the interests destroyed or upon a more or less arbitrary—and, as he thought, unjust—assessment by public officials. The subsection proceeded purely upon an arbitrary assessment. The thing to be taken into consideration was not the real market value of the property which was destroyed. That was carefully excluded from consideration, and the total value of the premises as assessed under Schedule A of the income-tax was alone to be considered. The rental value of the premises which it was assumed the brewers would have if the licence were withdrawn was to be deducted, and the difference was to be capitalised into a sum which would purchase an annuity at 4 per cent. interest for the remainder of the reduction period. The method of ascertaining the value of a house was an unreal, unjust, and false method. There was only one way to arrive at a just value, and that was to find out as nearly as one possibly could the value of the licensed premises as they were about to extinguish on the open market, if the property were put up for sale. The Under-Secretary had the figures which had been supplied by hon. Members on both sides of the House and which went to show the really gross and serious injustice which would be occasioned under this subsection, and were not to be relied upon because they omitted certain important particulars as to how the value of the licence had been arrived at, such as statements as to trade, and so on. Under the Act of 1904 they got, or might get as nearly as could be, the real market value, and certainly if that valuation was anything like honourably and reasonably carried out, then it was certain that the compensation proposed under this Bill was grossly and seriously unfair, and they could not expect any body of traders to submit to it as final, if indeed at all. He had some figures as to the compensation actually paid under the Act of 1904, and it was a mere matter of arithmetic to work out what that compensation would have been if made under this subsection. The result was so startling that he made no apology for submitting it to the House. Here were fourteen cases of licences extinguished during the last two years under the Act of 1904. The total sum paid in respect of these fourteen extinguished licences was £15,070, or an average per licence of £1,076. If these same licences, for which these sums had actually been paid in cash, were extinguished year by year during each year of the reduction period, under the proposals contemplated by this subsection, the total amount of compensation for the fourteen licences would be not £15,070 but only £973 all told, or an average per licence of £69 10s. Even if it were said that the valuation under the Act of 1904 was excessive, and grossly excessive, it was impossible for hon. Gentlemen opposite to persuade their fellow countrymen that it had been so grossly excessive as to account for the difference which resulted between the two methods of compensation. It was not reasonable to suppose that under any circumstances licences were worth only £69 10s., which had been compensated for at the average rate of £1,076. Was this reasonable? It was an overwhelming reduction in the scale of compensation to be granted. But they had been told several times by hon. Gentlemen opposite and in clear terms by the Under-Secretary that the result would not be so, because, if this subsection were allowed to come into operation, the trade all over the country would increase their assessments to income-tax under Schedule A. And that appeared to be regarded as a very fair and reasonable proposal. They were to single out a class of traders in the country who would have to increase their assessments under Schedule A.

It was not denied that there were great numbers of persons up and down the country, other than holders of licensed property, who were under-assessed. But it was not proposed to deal with them in any way. The Government singled out the licence-holder, and forced him by their legislation to tax himself at a higher rate than he would be called upon to do if he were engaged in some other trade. The object of an assessment to income-tax was not to indicate the value of a property; it was nothing more than a conventional form to raise taxation. They singled out a locality, and from that locality they had to raise a certain total amount, and, so long as they kept the proportion true between the various interests concerned, it did not matter whether the amount was £100 or £1,000, and the idea that the assessment of a building necessarily or inevitably represented its real rateable value was quite a novelty which had no basis either in theory or in practice. This scheme of compensation certainly seemed to be a great injustice. As had been pointed out, every year as they went on reducing the licences the value of the remaining licences round about would be increased. This increase of value was through the Government's own action in reducing the number of licences; yet at the end of the reduction period they would pay less in point of compensation. Take a public-house which was assessed under Schedule A at a rent of £100, and suppose that its rent unlicensed was taken to be £50, then the remaining £50 was the basis on which compensation would be calculated under this Bill. If that licence were destroyed at the beginning of the reduction period the Commissioners would have to multiply that £50 by 10·563, which was an actuarial figure, and the compensation would be £528, together with an allowance, which was immaterial for the purpose of the argument, for fixtures and disturbance. But should the licence not be taken away until the end of the reduction period, then each year of that reduction period it became more valuable by reason of the reduction of the number of licences round about; yet, instead of its being paid £528, as it would have been if taken in the first year, they would compensate—though it was worth more by the very operation of the Act—at the rate of something under £50, or rather less than one year's estimated revenue from the house without a licence. That appeared to be a grotesque system of compensation which could not be seriously defended in any quarter of the House. The Under-Secretary had referred to the matter of the tenant's interest and had professed great solicitude for the tenant in a licensed house. Unless the whole information he had been able to gather and the whole set of statements which had been made on behalf of the trade were grossly and ludicrously wrong, if the whole compensation to be granted under the clauses were to be given to the tenant solid, he would still be worse off than he was now under the Act of 1904, and it was idle for hon. Gentlemen opposite to pretend that the interest of the tenant under the Bill was going to be better safeguarded.

MR. HERBERT SAMUEL: I do not think the hon. Member quite appreciates that the tenants' compensation has nothing whatever to do with Schedule A value. It is additional and beyond that.

MR. BOWLES asked where it came from. The only compensation was Schedule A, except such a sum as the Commissioners of Inland Revenue might think it just to add as compensation for the licence-holders' loss of business. Was it likely that the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, who had not the faintest conceivable interest in the matter of the licence-holders' loss of business, were likely to take any particular pains to deal with the matter in a way that was really commensurate with the loss inflicted? If the hon. Gentleman really meant to compensate the tenant he ought to make some genuine proposals in the Bill which would show on what sort of scale that compensation was to take place. Merely to say that it should be left to the discretion of the Board of Inland Revenue might mean anything or nothing. The real objection felt opposite to real and genuine compensation on the market value at the moment to the man whose property was violently taken away against his will, was that, although that would be the just, and the only just way of dealing with the matter, it might interfere with that tremendous and progressive scheme of destruction which they regarded as essential to their temperance principles. He could well understand hon. Gentlemen maintaining that reduction was an important matter in the public interest, but fair and equal justice on the part of the State to every class of its citizens was of far greater importance, and would be found to be so as time went on, because he believed the compensation clauses of this Bill would inflict genuine and real hardship upon both the tenant and the licence-holder. So far no answer whatever had been given to those who held that if they were going for a public purpose to deprive any man of a business which he was carrying on lawfully and without misconduct, they were bound to pay, not some sum to be decided in a back room in somebody's house and dependent upon a perfectly valueless basis of assessment to income-tax, but the real and actual value in the market at the moment of extinction of the business.

MR. MOND (Chester), who was indistinctly heard, said it appeared to him that their opponents must have a bad case when they put forward the remarkable argument that the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, who had the duty cast upon them of assessing compensation, would not do it. Under the Act of 1904 the whole of this matter, in default of agreement, was left to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, though, he admitted, with an appeal to the High Court. If they were only allowed to speak their minds, tenants and managers would soon say that they would rather commit themselves to the care of the Commissioners than to the tender mercies of the brewers. It was perfectly ridiculous to tell them that this provision of the Bill was not welcomed by the tied-house tenants throughout the country. All the statistics put forward by the trade had been vitiated by the same mistake—they all went on the present assessment. They had made the trade a very fair proposition. They were to assess themselves at what compensation they wanted. This was a domestic arrangement. If the trade wanted to get more in the form of compensation, let them raise their assessment. But very likely it would suit them better to take less compensation, and at the same time, to pay less income-tax. They could arrange it that way if they liked. Why was it so immensely unfair? What seemed to him very unfair was that they who did not own licensed premises, had to pay income-tax on their profits and were not allowed to escape that assessment in the easy way in which gentlemen who owned licensed houses seemed to have escaped so far. They were not assessed in a fancy way. They were assessed on their balance sheets.

LORD R. CECIL: The hon. Member is confusing Schedule A and Schedule D.

MR. MOND said he was not confusing Schedule A with Schedule D. He did not see why under Schedule A they should escape their fair share of taxation any more than under Schedule D. They made their assessment at what they would like the compensation to be. It might be a bad or a good arrangement, he was not expressing an opinion on that subject, but it was quite useless to take the present assessment as a basis. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for St. George's, Hanover Square, spoke with very great authority on compensation and arbitration cases, but like some others who had had very large experience, in these cases their real commonsense judgment had gone for a walk. The weakness of the Kennedy judgment—he spoke with all deference of a Judge—was that it included in the valuation of licensed premises the wholesale profits of the brewer, on the assumption that if the houses were closed he would sell less beer. But that might not be the case. The brewer might sell the beer somewhere else. Take an analagous case. If they were assessing for town improvement a baker's shop and the shop was owned by a flour-miller, would any arbitrator take the profit made by the miller into consideration or merely the retail profit made by the baker as a baker? The miller obviously would not lose his sale of flour because the shop was taken away. He might sell the same amount to a shop in the next road. As a matter of fact he believed it was not the common practice in making valuations for public improvements to take in the wholesale profits at all. If it had been, there would never have been any necessity to go to Mr. Justice Kennedy and ask him what it meant. Who went to Mr. Justice Kennedy? The Law Officers of the Crown, instructed by the Inland Revenue Commissioners, who did not know what the Act meant, who evidently thought it meant something very different from what Mr. Justice Kennedy decided, and who for two years previously had decided a large number of cases on a different basis. The experience of the Act of 1904 showed that market value was not easy to define. The Government had adopted an infinitely easier method of dealing with the matter, and they had heard no argument from the other side to show that it was unfair. They were ready to listen to argument, and there was no idea of vindictiveness in this measure. No; the Member for Walton laughed, but the hon. Member would not accuse him of being vindictive or of wishing to desire to rob the Member for York or anybody else.

MR. F. E. SMITH: Merely for political reasons.

MR. MOND said that politically it was very foolish to be vindictive.

MR. G. D. FABER assured the hon. Member that he would not rob him because he was not interested in the trade.

MR. MOND said he was very glad to hear it for the hon. Member's sake. There was no desire to inflict injustice on any section of the community. The supporters of the Bill had been accused of being confiscators, spoliators, and thieves.

AN HON. MEMBER: So you are.

MR. MOND said they never yet had had any statement showing what the clause would actually do. The hon. Member for Walton himself had given them some figures which suffered from exactly the same vice as the others he had been criticising. How could they be asked as business men to accept the figures of a trade which could not even take the trouble to read carefully the clause, and base its estimates on the clause as it stood and not on a clause in their own wild imagination? With regard to the future, compensation and monopoly value had gone hand in hand under the Act of 1904, and they would naturally go hand in hand again under any new Act. It would be really worth while to consider this question carefully. The larger the amount of compensation the larger the amount of monopoly value in the future, and the smaller the amount of compensation the smaller the amount of monopoly value in the future. Would they prefer a larger compensation levy, and the same amount of compensation? Obviously what the right hon. Gentleman's Government wanted to do was to reduce licences more rapidly than they were being reduced to-day. They thought their Act would lead to a reduction of 2,500 a year. That figure had not and could not be reached on the present assessment scale and compensation levy. What was wanted was a reduction of licences, and the question of compensation was really a domestic question for the trade itself. Did the trade prefer the present scale of compensation and a higher compensation levy, or did they prefer a lower scale of compensation and the present compensation levy?

MR. CAVE (Surrey, Kingsthorpe) asked whether the hon. Member had authority to offer the former alternative?

MR. MOND said he had not. He was asking for information, and if they got the information it would facilitate discussion of a question which all reasonable people would like to see settled in a manner satisfactory to all parties.

And, it being Five of the Clock, the Chairman left the Chair to make his Report to the House.

Committee report Progress: to sit again upon Tuesday next.

House adjourned at Five o'clock.

SWEATED INDUSTRIES.

LORD AMPHILL rose "to ask whether His Majesty's Government have considered the evidence taken before, and the Report of, the Select Committee which was appointed by the House of Commons to consider and report upon the conditions of labour in trades in which home work is prevalent, and the proposals, including those for the establishment of wages boards and the licensing of work places, which have been made for the remedying of existing abuses; and whether having regard to the recommendations made by the Committee in favour of legislation at an early date to secure the establishment of wages boards in selected trades, and to make other provisions for improving the conditions of home workers in sweated industries, it is the intention of His Majesty's Government to introduce or to facilitate the progress of legislative measures to carry out such recommendations."

The noble Lord said: My Lords, I am sorry that my Question should be the occasion of a meeting of the House which would not otherwise have taken place, but I could not foresee, of course, that such would be the case. I desire to ask His Majesty's Government whether they intend to take any action on the Report of the Select Committee of the House of Commons in regard to home work.
 Much can be said on this subject, but personally I intend to say very little.
 My object is merely to obtain the bare information which I ask for in the Question on the Paper. I shall leave it to others more competent than myself, and with a better right to speak on the subject, to deal with the intricate economic and social aspects of the question either on this or some more appropriate occasion. I am sorry that my noble friend Lord Milner, who is particularly interested in this question, cannot be in the House as he is abroad, but I am glad to see that the noble Earl who took a leading part in this question some eighteen years ago, (the Earl of Dunraven), and my noble friend Lord Lytton are both here, and from them your Lordships might expect, either today or on some future occasion, to hear much that is valuable and interesting.

Your Lordships have, presumably, read during the recess the Report of the Select Committee of the House of Commons, and I would only ask for permission to remind you of two or three salient passages. The first is that no marked diminution of the evil of sweating has taken place since the Dunraven Committee reported in 1890. What the Committee say is that they are unable to find proof, either that it has increased or decreased. Secondly, the Committee state that sweating still exists in such a degree as to call urgently for the interference of Parliament; and, thirdly, there is the statement that the Committee regard it as extremely desirable that the subject referred to them should be dealt with by legislation at an early date. I think your Lordships will agree with me that we have cause to be ashamed, both as a nation and in Parliament, that eighteen years have been allowed to elapse since the Committee appointed by this House and presided over by the noble Earl, reported that the evils of sweating could hardly be exaggerated—that those eighteen years have been allowed to elapse without any effective remedy being applied, or without any very determined attempt being made to do so.

Surely, my Lords, it is a blot on our civilisation and humanity—that humanity of which, in so many respects, we are justly proud—that such an evil should exist at all, and still more, that it should have continued to exist for so long. It is my distinct impression that there is no depth of human misery so profound as that of the lot of the victims of sweated industries. It is a life of ceaseless, grinding, monotonous toil, commencing from tenderest childhood and lasting to the grave, and that in squalid dens and evil surroundings, with never the slightest taste of the joy of life or of that elementary satisfaction which the hunted savage even can derive from an occasional full meal, or from the healing influences of nature and sunshine. And to what end all this ceaseless, unending toil? For no other end than to maintain the barest vitality in poor, stunted, suffering bodies; for such is the fundamental instinct of nature, that love of life will not yield even to the greatest suffering.

I cannot believe that the sufferings of the victims of pestilence, famine, fire, and flood, wherever such calamities occur, are greater than those of these poor people. After all, those calamities are but incidents in an otherwise normal existence. Yet we as a nation are always prompt with sympathy, with succour, with material help, even when these calamities occur in distant lands. Again, I doubt whether those who are subjected to battle, to murder, to torment on account of religious or radical persecution, endure more than the workers in sweated industries. After all, their agony is more short lived. But here, again, we as a nation are ready to do anything, to risk much, in order to help them. It is only in the case of this greater, certainly equal, suffering which exists in our own midst that we do nothing. There is no popular sympathy or indignation, there are no clamorous appeals to Parliament, there is no eloquent advocacy in Parliament. Surely, my Lords, as a nation we neglect in a very strange manner the maxim that charity begins at home.

It would be deplorable—I think your Lordships will agree with me—if the interest in this all-important question which has lately been aroused in various ways, notably by the Sweated Industries Exhibition, and, more particularly, by the Report of the House of Commons Committee to which my Question refers—were allowed once more to die out as it did before. That interest has been aroused by the devoted and strenuous work of philanthropists and social reformers, who had an uphill task seeing that they have none of the advantages of possessing a political party or other widespread organisation at their backs. I gladly admit that my own interest in the subject, my own feelings of sympathy and indignation, were first aroused by the works of a lady whose name must be well-known to your Lordships. I refer to Miss Olive Malvern, and particularly to her books entitled “The Soul Market,” and “Baby Toilers.” The heroic enterprises of this lady in the cause of philanthropy more particularly interested me from the fact that she is not an English woman, but is of Indian birth. The interest which these books aroused in my mind naturally led me to seek for further information in such classic hand-books as that of Messrs Cadbury and Shann, in the very admirable Fabian tracts which must also be familiar to your Lordships, and, finally, in the records of Parliament. Ha Majesty's Government are engaged on a policy which is primarily one of social reform, and I would venture to ask the noble Lord who will reply for the Government whether, in his opinion, or in that of His Majesty's Government, there is any branch of social reform which calls more urgently for attention than the lot of the victims of sweated industries.

*THE LORD PRIVY SEAL AND SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (The Earl of CREWE): My Lords, my right hon. friend the Home Secretary has asked me to reply to this Question rather than leave it to be answered departmentally, because, as we understand, the noble Lord's object was not so much to discuss the very important question with which his query deals as to ascertain what the intentions of His Majesty's Government are in the direction of legislation. The noble Lord has not over-stated the importance of this question, which in all its aspects, I think, appeals to the sentiments of humanity of every Member of both Houses without distinction of party. That was made very clear by a debate which took place in the other House towards the end of February of this year when the Sweated Industries Bill was brought in by a private Member. A general measure of sympathy was expressed with the actual Bill, accompanied, however, by a very considerable degree of nervousness as to the particular remedy which the Bill proposed. I dare say some of your Lordships may have read the debate. Though, as I say, the sentiment of sympathy was a unanimous one, yet marked differences of opinion, by no means following the ordinary lines of party discussion, were expressed by Members of the other House.

It was, I think, generally agreed that for the system of mere cheapness in these industries there was nothing to be said on the ground of economy, any more than on the ground of humanity. That, I think, was common ground. It was generally agreed that these miserably low wages do not really mean in the proper sense cheap production, and there was a feeling that something ought to be done to put a stop to the system. The poor people who suffer under these disabilities cannot help themselves in the way in which other trades have helped themselves, by organisation. That is a cardinal fact in the whole situation. If they could organise as other trades have organised the question would settle itself; but that, owing to the conditions of work for one thing, is primarily impossible, and it is rendered less possible still by the differences of race and by the class of those who are subjected, or, indeed, subject themselves to these lamentable conditions of work.

The noble Lord, in his Question, asks us in so many words whether, having regard to the recommendations made by the Committee in favour of legislation at an early date to secure the establishment of wages boards in selected trades and to make other provisions for improving the conditions of home workers in sweated industries, it is the intention of His Majesty's Government to introduce, or to facilitate the progress of, legislative measures to carry out such recommendations. I wish I could give an answer to the noble Lord, but I am in fact not in a position to do; and, if he comes to think of it, I think he will see that his Question is not, I will not say a reasonable one, but one to which he could expect to receive a definite reply. We are now in the progress of an autumn session, and we still find ourselves with two of the principal measures of this year's legislative work suspended in the balance. In these circumstances I think the noble Lord will agree that it is hardly fair to suppose that I at this moment, speaking on behalf of the Government, can make any indications whatever of what our political attempts will be next year.

We have been told sometimes—it is not for me to say whether there is any colour for the charge—that our zeal for social reform has led us to ask Parliament to do more than it can reasonably be asked to perform within the period of any single session. We have been told so this year not for the first time, and, consequently, we are bound to walk warily in that respect, and even if we agree that regarded as a measure of social reform this, as the noble Lord says, yields in importance to no other, yet it would not be possible for us at this time of the year to make any promise of the kind which the noble Lord asks us to make. I am perfectly certain, and I think it was evident to anybody who read my right hon. friend's speech in the House of Commons in February last, that he has the matter very sincerely at heart. At the same time it would be deceiving ourselves to pretend that this is an uncontroversial question. The remedies of which the noble Lord speaks, not to say anything at this moment about their merits, are certainly not remedies which will be accepted as a matter of course by all. Legislation on the matter will be a complicated, long, and a difficult process, and in these circumstances I must ask the noble Lord to relieve me from the necessity of giving anything like a definite answer to the Question he has put.

*EARL CROMER: May we understand from what the noble Earl has said that His Majesty's Government are not pledged to the principle of a minimum wage fixed by law?

*The EARL OF CREWE: That is undoubtedly so. If the noble Earl will read my right hon. friend's speech he will see that he stated so in so many words in the debate to which I have alluded.

*EARL CROMER: And the matter remains in the same way at present?

*The EARL OF CREWE: Yes.

The EARL OF DUNRAVEN: My Lords, I think your Lordships will be grateful to my hon. friend for having asked this Question, for this House has not been second to any in the sympathy it has shown for the lowest class of this country, commonly known as sweated labour. I do not think the noble Lord has in any degree exaggerated the sad conditions under which these unfortunate people try to make a living. At the same time, I think that he perhaps exaggerated a little in saying that nothing had been done to better their conditions during the last eighteen years. For although their circumstances are very far indeed from what they ought to be, I do not think there can be any doubt that the factory legislation that has taken place during the last eighteen years has benefited them at any rate to some extent.

As the noble Earl opposite has said, this is a most difficult and complicated question. Perhaps the main factor in the case is the thorough registration and proper inspection of all places where this class of labour is carried on. That brings one at once against a very delicate question, as to how far it is legitimate and proper to interfere with people in their own dwelling-rooms, for a great deal of this work is carried on in the rooms in which the people dwell. The noble Earl the Leader of the House is perfectly right in saying that the main difficulty in the case is that these trades are totally unorganised. They are unorganised for the reasons which the noble Earl gave, and, I think, mainly for another reason why he did not give—namely, that they are constantly subject to the influx of the lowest class of foreign labour, which renders organisation practically impossible.

I agree with the noble Earl that it is, perhaps, somewhat unreasonable to ask for a definite answer at the present moment as to what steps the His Majesty's Government intend to take, or whether they intend to take any steps. The programme of His Majesty's Government, especially in matters of social reform, is tolerably overburdened as it is. But I would venture to say that it appears to me that in matters of social reform perhaps the wisest course may be to begin at the bottom, and attempt to remedy those cases in which distress is most severe; and I would express the hope that if His Majesty's Government remain in office for some years, as I have no doubt they will, they will in a future session deal with this matter of sweated labour and make it one of the principal planks in their programme for the session.

House adjourned at five minutes before Five o'clock, till Tomorrow, half-past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Monday, 26th October, 1908.

The House met at a quarter before Three of the Clock.

PETITIONS.

LICENSING BILL.

LONDON (EQUALISATION OF RATES) ACT, 1894 (ACCOUNTS UNDER SECTION 1 (7) OF THE ACT).

Return presented, relative thereto ordered 22nd July; Mr. Masterman; to lie upon the Table and to be printed. No. 308.]

POLLING DISTRICTS (COUNTY BOROUGH OF HUDDERSFIELD).

Copy presented, of Order made by the Council of the County Borough of Huddersfield dividing the several Wards of the Borough into Polling Districts [by Act]; to lie upon the Table.

SHOP HOURS ACT, 1904.

Copy presented, of Order made by the Secretary for Scotland providing for the early Closing of certain classes of Shops in the burgh of Coatbridge [by Act]; to lie upon the table.

BOARD OF EDUCATION.

Copy presented, of List of Certified Schools for Blind, Deaf, Defective, and epileptic Children in England and Wales on the 31st July, 1908 [by Command]; to lie upon the Table.

PUBLIC REVENUE (INTERCEPTION).

Return presented, relative thereto [ordered 14th October; Mr. Bowles]; to lie upon the Table, and to be printed.

POST OFFICE (LIFE INSURANCE).

Copy ordered, "of Report of, and Evidence taken by, the Departmental Committee on the encouragement of the Life Insurance system of the Post Office." —(Mr. Sydney Buxton.)

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS CIRCULATED WITH THE VOTES.*Repairs to Ships.

MR. MITCHELL-THOMSON (Lanarkshire, N.W.): To ask the First Lord of the Admiralty, whether the repairs to be undertaken during the winter are to be confined to vessels requiring repairs in the nature of an extensive refit.

(Answered by Mr. McKenna.) The repairs will not necessarily be confined to any particular class of work, but will be arranged with relation to the degree of urgency and importance of the respective ships.

MR. MITCHELL-THOMSON: To ask the First Lord of the Admiralty, whether he will state the names of the vessels upon which repairs are to be undertaken during the winter, which have not already appeared in the Estimates.

(Answered by Mr. McKenna.) It is not the present intention to commence during the coming winter large repairs to any ship whose name has not appeared in the Navy Estimates for the current year.

Weekly Half-Holiday in Fermanagh Post Office.

MR. FETHERSTONHAUGH (Fermanagh, N.): To ask the Postmaster-General, if he has yet concluded his inquiries into the question of allowing a weekly half-holiday and reducing the attendance on bank holidays; and how soon are the sub-offices in county Fermanagh likely to have the benefit of a change in the present practice.

(Answered by Mr. Sydney Buxton.) Steps are being taken to restrict the attendance at all offices on bank holidays as far as possible, and the sub-postmasters in county Fermanagh, as elsewhere have been duly informed of the conditions on which a weekly half-holiday can be granted under the terms of the Parliamentary Committee's Report. All applications for that concession are dealt with as they arise.

London and Paris Mails.

MR. PIRIE (Aberdeen, N.): To ask the Postmaster-General if he would give the distances between London and Paris, respectively, via Dover and Calais and via Folkestone and Boulogne; and if he would state the extra mileage covered daily and yearly by the mail services between these two capitals owing to the carrying of the mails over the longer of the two routes, stating also the number of mail services daily by each route.

(Answered by Mr. Sydney Buxton.) The distance between London and Paris via Dover and Calais is 287 statute miles, and by Folkestone and Boulogne 259 statute miles. The number of mail services daily by each route is; to Paris via Dover and Calais three on week-days; to Paris via Dover and Calais two on Sundays; and via Folkestone and Boulogne two on week-days only; to London via Calais and Dover three daily; and via Folkestone and Boulogne one daily. If all the mails could be conveyed by the Folkestone-Boulogne route (which is not the case) and the total number of services was the same as at present, there would be reduction in mileage traversed of 168 miles a day or 59,864 miles a year.

Companies (Consolidation) Bill.

MR. HYDE (Wednesbury): To ask the President of the Board of Trade, whether it is the intention of the Government to proceed further this session with the Companies (Consolidation) Bill.

(Answered by Mr. Churchill.) Yes, Sir, it is the intention of the Government to proceed with the Companies (Consolidation) Bill, and I have every hope that it will pass into law this session. The Bill has undergone careful scrutiny by a very strong Joint Committee of both Houses, and in the form recommended by the Committee it will very shortly be introduced in this House.

Overtime of Provincial Sorting Clerks and Telegraphists.

MR. JAMES PARKER (Halifax): To ask the Postmaster-General, whether he can state the number of hours overtime worked by the provincial sorting clerks telegraphists during the last financial year.

(Answered by Mr. Sydney Buxton.) The information is not readily available. To obtain it would require separate returns for each district, which would involve considerable work and expense.

Licensing Bill—Parliamentary Control of Licensing Commissioners.

MR. STUART-WORTLEY (Sheffield, Hallam): To ask the Prime Minister whether, before Clauses 12 and 14 of the Licensing Bill are reached, he will cause Amendments to be placed upon the Notice Paper giving effect to his promise that those clauses should be so modified as to secure that the proceedings of the Licensing Commissioners should be effectually kept under Parliamentary criticism and control.

(Answered by Mr. Asquith.) The necessary Amendments to give effect to this have been placed on the Notice Paper under the name of my hon. and learned friend the Solicitor-General.

Suggested Deportation of Alien Unskilled Workers.

MR. FETHERSTONHAUGH: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, whether there are any statistics in the possession of the Department showing the numerical proportion of the unskilled alien workers at present employed in Great Britain to the British unemployed and, as most of these aliens come from countries much nearer than China, will he consider the advisability of following the South African precedent and restoring them to their respective domiciles of origin.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Gladstone.) The answer to both Questions is in the negative.

Deaths Caused by Motor Vehicles.

MR. MACKARNESS (Berkshire, Newbury): To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has any information at his disposal showing the number of accidents and deaths connected with motor vehicles during the first six months of this year in England and Wales, or in either.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Gladstone.)

No, Sir. I can only give the figures for London. May I refer my hon. friend to two Answers which I gave to the hon. Member for the Mansfield Division on 21st October.

Speed of Motor Vehicles.

MR. MACKARNESS: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether the police have any instructions to enforce any particular speed limit upon motor vehicles in the main thoroughfares of the metropolitan area; and, if so, can he state what those instructions are.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Gladstone.)

The speed of motor omnibuses and other heavy motors varies from six to twelve miles an hour, according to the construction of the vehicle, under regulations made by the Local Government Board. The speed of light motors is subject to the maximum of twenty miles an hour, save in royal parks, where it is ten, and in certain other places, where the speed of all motor traffic is restricted to ten miles an hour by order of the Local Government Board, made at the request of the local authority. The speed of tramcars is regulated by the Board of Trade, and varies from four to sixteen miles an hour, according to the circumstances of each portion of the track. The police have instructions to enforce all these limits as effectively as possible.

Alleged Understaffing of Prisons.

MR. C. DUNCAN (Barrow-in-Furness): To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether an augmentation of the staffs in prisons is necessary to adequately cope with the work; whether he is aware that in some cases prisoners are detained in their cells for lack of officers to supervise them in their work outside; and whether he will take some action in the matter with a view to relieving to some extent the present acute state of unemployment.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Gladstone.)

I have no reason to think that any general augmentation of the prison staff is necessary. If, from a temporary rise of population or other cause, the staff in any prison becomes insufficient temporary assistance is obtained. Except in such special circumstances the staff is sufficient to supervise prisoners eligible for employment outside their cells, and I should not be justified in adding to it.

Unemployment in London, Berlin and New York.

EARL WINTERTON (Sussex, Horsham): To ask the President of the Board of Trade if any accurate comparable statistics are obtainable relative to the amount of unemployment in Berlin, London and New York for September last.

(Answered by Mr. Churchill.) No, Sir.

Unemployment Returns.

MR. CHIOZZA-MONEY (Paddington, N.): To ask the President of the Board of Trade if, in view of the importance of the subject matter, he can see his way to issue as a monthly Parliamentary White Paper an amplification of the Unemployment Returns issued in the Board of Trade monthly gazette, with details given separately for such of the trade unions which report to the labour department.

(Answered by Mr. Churchill.) It would not be possible for me to publish particulars as to the percentage unemployed in each of the 257 trade unions which make monthly Returns of employment to the Board of Trade, as they are obtained upon the understanding that individual Returns will not be disclosed.

Imports of British Cloths into Canada.

MR. CHIOZZA MONEY: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if his attention has been directed to the fact that the Canadian Manufacturers' Association is officially representing to the Canadian Government that British manufacturers are taking advantage of the Canadian public by exporting to Canada cloths which are shoddy and rubbish; whether he is aware that it was owing to similar representations that the Canadian Manufacturers' Association in 1904 was able to obtain the practical abolition of the preference on British Woollens, the minimum duty on which is now as high as 30 per cent.; and whether he is taking any steps to counteract the renewed misrepresentations.

(Answered by Mr. Churchill.) My attention has been directed to this matter. The duty leviable on British woollen cloths and clothing is correctly stated. I have no reason to believe that the allegations which appeared in the official organ of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association have any foundation; and I understand that the Secretary of the Association has cabled an expression of regret for any injustice that may have been done to British manufacturers by the publication of them. I am of opinion, however, that such misrepresentations can best be met by action on the part of the chambers of commerce in the home district concerned.

Cotton Trade Dispute.

MR. FELL (Great Yarmouth): To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he proposes to take any steps in the near future to try and conciliate the various interests of those engaged in the cotton industry and to end the lamentable position now prevailing.

(Answered by Mr. Churchill.) The course and consequence of this grave dispute have from its beginning been a subject of daily preoccupation to me, but I have at present no statement to make to Parliament upon it.

Unemployment in Germany.

MR. GOULDING (Worcester): To ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he can state what is the information on which he bases his conclusion that there is more unemployment in this country than Germany.

(Answered by Mr. Churchill.) There are no comparable statistics of the degrees of unemployment in different countries, which vary relatively from time to time; and my statement was based upon a general survey of the conditions which appear to prevail at the present moment in Great Britain and Germany so far as they are known to the Board of Trade. These conditions have in Great Britain been peculiarly aggravated by the coincidence of an acute depression and protracted labour disputes.

Dismissal of Midland Railway Goods Guards.

MR. HUDSON (Newcastle-on-Tyne): To ask the President of the Board of Trade if his attention has been called to the large number of dismissals of the highest paid goods guards by the Midland Railway Company, and whose duties are now being performed by lower paid men; and can he say what are the number of hours per day and per week this grade of men has recently been working.

MR. HUDSON: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he can say whether the reduction in the standard of wages now being received by Midland Railway guards owing to a large number of the highest paid men having been dismissed is, or is not, a wages question within the meaning of the agreement under which the conciliation boards were recently constructed; and whether the Midland Railway Company have made any application for their operation in this instance.

(Answered by Mr. Churchill.) I will answer these two Questions together. My attention has been drawn to the dismissals of certain goods guards on the Midland Railway, and I have been in communication with the railway company and with my hon. friend the Member for Derby. I understand that the matter has been already discussed between the representatives of the company and of the men at meetings of the sectional and central conciliation boards, and that it is still under consideration, and I am not without hope that an arrangement may be arrived at.

Unemployed Grant to Ireland.

MR. NANNETTI (Dublin, College Green): To ask the President of the Local Government Board what was the amount of the grant from the Unemployed Fund voted to Ireland for the work of the distress committees for the year 1906-7; what was the amount voted to each of the various distress committees who put the Unemployed Act into operation, and the amount subscribed from the rates and from voluntary subscriptions; what was the duration of employment to each applicant in each district, and the number of persons who registered themselves; and whether he can say how soon this year a grant will be made from the Unemployed Fund to the distress committees, and how much to Ireland the grant will be in relief of the want of employment in that country.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) My right hon. friend has asked me to reply to this Question. The amounts granted to Ireland were: in the year 1906-7, £11,050, and in the year 1907-8, £4,500. Some particulars of the grants to distress committees will be found in the annual Reports of the Local Government Board for those years. I have sent to the hon. Member a statement showing the amounts in detail. The Board are not in possession of the required particulars as to voluntary subscriptions, subsidies from local rates, the duration of employment of each applicant, and the number of registered applicants, but the Board will make it a condition of further grants that full information upon these points shall be furnished by the local bodies. Grants are being made from this year's Vote according as applications are received and as the necessity is shown to arise. I understand that the Treasury have not yet allocated the current year's provision between the three countries, but I may say that every application from Ireland will be dealt with upon its merits and with due regard to the relative necessities of the districts in which there is abnormal distress from want of employment.

Unemployed Grant to Belfast.

MR. GEORGE CLARK (Belfast, N.): To ask the President of the Local Government Board what proportion of the £300,000 to be given for the relief of unemployment will be allocated to Belfast.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) The sum of £1,000 has already been allotted to Belfast out of this year's Vote, and the question of making a further allocation will be considered in due course.

Fishery Cruiser for the Bahamas.

MR. CARLILE (Hertfordshire, St. Albans): To ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether, in view of the fact that in the month of May, 1908, eight Bahamian turtling vessels were seized by Cuban revenue cutters and towed into Cuban ports, the owners being heavily fined and the vessels and crews detained for three months, the Government is now prepared to send the cruiser to the Bahamas which has been asked for by the Government of those islands.

(Answered by Mr. McKenna.) The incident of the seizure of the Bahamian turtling vessels was dealt with on the spot through His Majesty's representative at Havana, and it was therefore unnecessary to send one of His Majesty's ships to Cuban waters. No subsequent incident has rendered the presence of a man-of-war desirable, and it is not therefore proposed to send one, but His Majesty's Government will take all proper steps for the protection of British interests. His Majesty's ship "Scylla" has, however, recently visited the Bahamas at the request of the Governor, but it was with a view to the distribution of relief to the sufferers by the hurricane, and not in connection with the turtling incident.

Naval Works—Under-Expenditure caused by Strikes.

MR. BELLAIRS (Lynn Regis): To ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether he can now state within £25,000 what is the anticipated under-expenditure which has been caused by strikes and out of which £200,000 is to be spent on the earlier commencement of five cruisers and nine destroyers and £73,500 on extra repairs this financial year; and whether, in order to get the full benefit of this extra work, he will see that its effect is not cancelled by savings on other Votes in order to provide a sum of over a quarter of a million sterling for the purchase of two destroyers which are already built and for the salvage of H.M.S. "Gladiator."

(Answered by Mr. McKenna.) The figures asked for cannot yet be given. Every endeavour will be made to get the full benefit from this extra work. I must add that my hon. friend's estimate of a quarter of a million sterling is purely fanciful.

Admiralty Excess Expenditure.

MR. BELLAIRS: To ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether he is aware that the expenditure already incurred by the Admiralty on the salvage of the "Gladiator," and on the purchase of two ready-built destroyers announced last July, involves a sum of over £200,000 sterling which has not yet been provided by Parliament; and whether he will introduce a Supplementary Estimate instead of resorting to the course followed last year when the unexpected expenditure of £200,000 on refrigerating machinery was met by cutting down necessary work elsewhere.

(Answered by Mr. McKenna.) I am not aware of the truth of the allegation made in the first part of the hon. Member's Question. It has indeed no relation to the facts. I cannot agree that the hon. Member correctly represents what occurred as to the cooling machinery, nor that a Supplementary Estimate and the cutting down of necessary work elsewhere exhaust all the alternatives.

Trials of New Destroyers.

SIR GILBERT PARKER (Gravesend): To ask the First Lord of the Admiralty, when it is expected that the trials of the two destroyers recently purchased will be completed.

(Answered by Mr. McKenna.) The destroyers in question have not yet been accepted by the Admiralty. The date of completion of trials cannot yet be stated.

Repairing Station for Submarines at Dundee.

MAJOR ANSTRUTHER GRAY (St. Andrews Burghs): To ask the first Lord of the Admiralty if he can furnish any information with regard to the establishment of a repairing station for submarine vessels at Dundee; and whether any works of a permanent nature are contemplated there, and how many men will be employed.

(Answered by Mr. McKenna.) With regard to the first and last part of the hon. Members Question, no information can yet be furnished. The reply to the second part of the Question is in the negative.

The Channel Fleet—Ships Absent.

MR. HUNT (Shropshire, Ludlow): To ask the First Lord of the Admiralty, what is the largest number of the battleships of the active Channel Fleet which were absent from that fleet at one time between the 23rd of last September and the 20th of the present month.

(Answered by Mr. McKenna.) The reply to the hon. Member's Question is nine.

The Unemployed at Rosyth.

MAJOR ANSTRUTHER GRAY: To ask the First Lord of the Admiralty how many of the unemployed he intends to employ on the works at Rosyth and other Government stations in Scotland during the rest of the financial year.

(Answered by Mr. McKenna.) The Admiralty works in Scotland are carried out by contract, so that the Admiralty can give no direct employment except to a very few men employed on odd jobs.

Docking Accommodation for Submarines on the North-East Coast.

MR. R. HARCOURT (Montrose Burghs): To ask the First Lord of the Admiralty, whether the Board are contemplating the provision of temporary docking accommodation for submarines on the north-east coast; and, if so, whether the harbours of Arbroath and Montrose have been under consideration in that connection.

(Answered by Mr. McKenna.) The reply to the first part of my hon. friend's Question is in the affirmative, and to the second in the negative.

Private Workshops and Naval Repairs.

MR. RENWICK (Newcastle-on-Tyne): To ask the First Lord of the Admiralty if any, and what, proportion of the repairs to be executed during the winter will be entrusted to private shipbuilding and repairing works.

(Answered by Mr. McKenna.) It is not proposed to place any portion of the repairs referred to with private shipbuilding and repairing works.

Marine Insurance—Insurable Interest.

MR. BOTTOMLEY (Hackney, S.): To ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether he is aware that a clause is frequently inserted in policies of marine insurance providing that the production of such policies shall be deemed sufficient evidence of insurable interest; and whether, in view of what occurred in evidence at recent wreck inquiries, he can see his way to introduce a Bill requiring proof of insurable interest in all claims under marine policies, as is done in the cases of fire and life insurance.

(Answered by Mr. Churchill.) My right hon. friend has asked me to reply to this Question. The subject of the insurances to which the Question refers is now under my consideration, and I propose shortly to confer with representatives of the interests concerned with a view to deciding what steps, if any, it is advisable to take in the matter.

Rosyth Dockyard Water Scheme.

MR. BELLAIRS: To ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether the original estimate of £100,000 for the Rosyth Dockyard water scheme in the agreement made by the Admiralty with the district committee is likely to be exceeded owing to erroneous forecasts as to the strata; and whether he can state what payment in connection with this scheme will fall due this financial year.

(Answered by Mr. McKenna.) The original estimate is likely to be exceeded by about £73,000, in consequence of engineering difficulties which have been met with. No payment on account of the scheme will be made this financial year, because the capital cost is paid by a "loan," and the Admiralty only begin to make an annual payment when we get water supplied.

Local Government Scotland Bill.

MR. EUGENE WASON (Clackmannan and Kinross): To ask the Secretary for Scotland whether he intends to proceed further with the Local Government (Scotland) Bill this session.

(Answered by Mr. Sinclair.) Yes, Sir.

Improvement of Main Roads, Sutherland.

MR. MORTON (Sutherland): To ask the Secretary for Scotland whether he will arrange for a grant of money to the county council of Sutherland for the purpose of improving the 660 miles of main roads in that county, an expense which it is impossible for the overburdened ratepayers to meet out of the local rates; and whether he is aware that the main cause of this expense is the motor traffic.

(Answered by Mr. Sinclair.) I regret I cannot hold out any prospect of a grant for the purpose referred to, but my hon. friend is aware that the increased expense of road maintenance alleged to be due to motor car traffic is receiving the attention of the Government.

Whaling Steamer Licences.

MR. MORTON: To ask the Secretary for Scotland whether the licences for whaling steamers have yet been granted for 1909; and, if not, will he instruct the Fishery Board for Scotland to grant licences for one steamer only to each station, in terms of the recommendation of the Departmental Committee in 1904.

(Answered by Mr. Sinclair.) No licences have yet been granted for 1909. The Board's procedure in respect of existing licences will be governed by the provisions of The Whale Fisheries (Scotland) Act, 1907, Section 2 (4.)

Illegal Trawling in St. Andrews Bay.

MAJOR ANSTRUTHER-GRAY: To ask the Secretary for Scotland whether he is aware that complaints are being made of illegal trawling within the three-mile limit off the east coast of Fife, particularly in St. Andrews Bay; and whether he will take the necessary steps to put an end to these depredations.

(Answered by Mr. Sinclair.) Only one complaint has been received since July, and this was attended to. A cruiser has been continually on the fishing grounds off the Fife coast since the 16th instant with the exception of one day.

Crofters' Commission—Applicants Fees.

MR. DUNDAS WHITE (Dumbartonshire): To ask the Secretary for Scotland if he will state, under the procedure of the Crofters' Commission, what is the usual cost to an individual crofter who makes application to have a fair rent fixed by the Commission.

(Answered by Mr. Sinclair.) If a crofter chooses to employ a law agent to act for him, he can pay such fees as may be arranged between agent and client, but under No. 16 of the Rules and Regulations, dated 21st September, 1886 (given at pages 110–113 of the First Report of the Crofters' Commission [Cd. 5247, 1888]), parties before the Commission may appear personally, or by a law agent, or by a friend. A crofter or a landlord may thus dispense with the services of an agent, which is the usual practice, and all the fees payable are set fourth in the table of Exchequer fees. Page 130 of the said Report shows that these amount to 1s. 6d. for a single fair-rent application. When a number of crofters combine and apply in Form 2 the fees are still less. Thus, twelve applicants pay 12s. on the principal application and 1s. on the copy sent to the landlord, or 1s. 1d. each; and similarly twenty-four applicants pay 25s. altogether, or 1s. 0½d. each.

Case of Misses Kate and Hannah Nagle at Kildorrery Petty Session.

MR. WILLIAM ABRAHAM (Cork County, N.E.): To ask Mr. Attorney-General whether his attention has been called to the proceedings at the petty sessions court, Kildorrery, County Cork, on the 14th instant, on the occasion of the hearing of charges brought against Misses Kate and Hannah Nagle, daughters of Mrs. Alice Nagle, an evicted tenant, by the present holder of her farm; and if he will explain why the presiding magistrate adopted the unusual course of refusing an application of the defendants for an adjournment to the next petty sessions court to enable them to employ a solicitor to conduct their defence, which they could not do in consequence of the summonses having only been served upon them at 9 o'clock on the previous night.

(Answered by Mr. Cherry.) I have no power to interfere with the action of a magistrate in the exercise of his judicial discretion. I understand, moreover, that in this case the defendants have lodged an appeal against their conviction, and they will, therefore, have full opportunity of testing the validity of the resident magistrate's decision.

Registration of Title to Land.

MR. ATHERLEY-JONES (Durham, N.W.): To ask Mr. Attorney-General whether the Royal Commission at present inquiring into the operation of the law governing the registration of title to land is confined in its inquiry to an investigation of the working of the land registry office; and whether there would be any, and, if so, what, objection to the enlargement of the scope of its functions so as to enable it to inquire whether any further legislation is required to facilitate, and lessen the cost of the transfer of estates in land.

(Answered by Sir William Robson.) The Royal Commission is empowered to consider and report upon the working of the Land Transfer Acts, and whether any amendments are desirable. It is not confined merely to an investigation of the working of the local registry office. This is an inquiry of considerable scope, and would not appear to preclude the Commission from reporting in the direction suggested by the Question if they see fit to do so.

MR. REMNANT (Finsbury, Holborn): To ask Mr. Attorney-General if his attention has been called to the resolutions passed at the recent Law Society's conference on the Land Transfer Acts; and if he can see his way to give effect thereto.

(Answered by Sir William Robson.) Having regard to the nature and subject matter of the inquiry into the working of the Land Transfer Acts, it is essential that the Royal Commission should be as far as practicable free from prepossessions, and it has been composed with that view, but there is no reason why every view of the subject should not be presented in evidence by those who have special knowledge or interest. The other matters in the Law Society's resolutions appear to be entirely for the discretion of the Royal Commissioners themselves.

MR. REMNANT: To ask Mr. Attorney-General whether in connection with the registration of titles under The Land Transfer Act, 1897, he will consider the advisability of recommendation being made to the Privy Council to exercise the power given to the Council by the Act to revoke the Order applying compulsory registration of title to the county of London, so as to leave property owners free to register or not as they deem best in their own interest.

(Answered by Sir William Robson.) The compulsory registration of titles to land in the county of London is, as the hon. Member is aware, the subject of inquiry by a Royal Commission, and it would be improper of me to anticipate or prejudice their Report by taking the course suggested in this Question.

Reorganisation of the Indian Public Works Department.

MR. HART-DAVIES (Hackney, N.): To ask the Under-Secretary of State for India whether memorials have been received at the India Office protesting against the proposed reorganisation of the Public Works Department in India, and especially against the proposed discrimination between the imperial and provincial services; and what action, if any, has been taken by the India Office on these memorials.

(Answered by Mr. Buchanan.) No memorials of the nature indicated have been received at the India Office since the introduction of the new scheme of reorganisation of the Public Works Department in India.

Boycotting in County Clare.

MR. MOORE (Armagh, N.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been directed to the observations of the Lord Chief Justice at the Clare spring assizes, on which occasion the learned judge, referring to the returns of boycotting presented to him by the police authorities, pointed out that these returns comprised eleven cases which were described as instances of minor boycotting, and that in five of these cases people not only declined to associate with or deal with the boycotted families, but the latter were also compelled to go considerable distances for the necessaries of life; whether the cases of these five families have since been retained on the list of persons boycotted in a minor degree; and will he state in what respects their cases differ from others which are included in the category of serious boycotting.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) The Answer to the first two paragraphs of the Question is in the affirmative. The local police, who are acquainted with all the circumstances, classify the cases of boycotting upon the principles which are fully stated in my reply to a Question put by the right hon. Member for South Dublin on 20th March, 1907.

Appointment of Inspectors of Irish Intermediate Schools.

MR. LONSDALE (Armagh, Mid.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Treasury have ratified the appointment by the Commissioners of Intermediate Education of inspectors for Irish intermediate schools; and, if so, when it is intended to make the appointments.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) It is intended to appoint inspectors, but the details have not yet been settled. I am not yet in a position to say when the appointments will be made.

Removal of Tumuli from White Hill near Lydford.

MR. HORNIMAN (Chelsea): To ask the Secretary of State for War whether, recently, thirteen tumuli were removed by the War Office or other military authorities from the top of White Hill, Willsworthy, near Lydford, so that a flagstaff might be erected; if so, whether instructions will be given that, in future, such relics of bygone ages shall, where possible, be preserved.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Haldane.) My hon. friend appears to be referring to an incident which occurred early in 1907, and in regard to which representations were made by members of the Dartmoor Exploration Committee. Notices were in consequence posted up by the military authorities with a view to preventing any further destruction of objects of antiquarian interest, and it is understood with satisfactory results.

Painting of the Royal Barracks, Dublin—The Fair Wages Clause.

MR. NANNETTI (Dublin, College Green): To ask the Secretary of State for War if he is aware that the Fair Wages Clause of the House of Commons is not being carried out by the painting contractor for the work now being done at the Royal Barracks, Dublin; whether he is aware that the glazing and putting in of panes of glass in the various barracks is also being executed under the standard rate of pay; and will he take steps to see that the Fair Wages Clause is carried out by the contractors on these works.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Haldane.) The matter has been inquired into, and it appears that the current rate of the district has been and is paid by the contractors, and that the conditions of the contract relating to wages are being properly observed.

Rebuilding of Windsor Barracks.

MR. J. F. MASON (Windsor): To ask the Secretary of State for War whether, in view of the threatened scarcity of employment and destitution in the coming winter, the promised rebuilding of the barracks at Windsor is likely to be begun soon; and, if so, whether he is in a position to name approximately the date at which the work may be expected to commence.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Haldane.)
A further contract has now been made for the completion of the new barrack blocks. I cannot state the date of commencement, as it rests with the contractor.

Delay in Gazetting Officers to the Territorial Army.

LORD BALCARRES (Lancashire, Chorley): To ask the Secretary of State for War if he is aware that the delay in gazetting officers to the Territorial Army is causing inconvenience in Lancashire, and that officers accepted several months ago, who have bought their uniforms, served throughout camp, and mastered their drill, are still without commissions; and if the matter can be remedied with some promptitude.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Haldane.)
I am quite aware that the gazetting of officers to the Territorial Force is a long and tedious process, and all that can be done is being done to shorten it. Much reference to the commands is involved before the 8,000 names which have to be approved can be settled.

Ballina Mail Deliveries.

MR. FETHERSTONHAUGH (Fermanagh, N.): To ask the Postmaster-General if he will say in what way it would be more costly for the Ballina to Crossmolina mail car to start at 12.30 as compared with 4.30; does the 9.15 a.m. train from Dublin carry letters from Dublin as well as the day mail; and between what hours must letters be posted in order to go by the 9.15 train from Dublin.

(Answered by Mr. Sydney Buxton.) If the day mail car were run at the time proposed by the hon. Member a considerably higher subsidy to the contractor would be necessary, as there would be less passenger traffic. The 9.15 a.m. train from Dublin conveys letters arriving in Dublin by the supplementary night mail from England, and letters posted at the General Post Office, Dublin, between 6.15 a.m. and 8.15 a.m., as well as parcels posted at the Amiens Street office up to 8.20 a.m.

Crown Lands in Carnarvon.

MR. ELLIS DAVIES (Carnarvonshire, Eifion): To ask the Secretary to the Treasury what is the extent in acres of Crown land in the parishes of Aber, Llandegai, and Llanllechid, respectively, in the county of Carnarvon; and whether he will give in each case, separately, the acreage of the land with the minerals or mineral rights only.

(Answered by Mr. Hobhouse.)

Parish.	Crown lands.	Lands in which the Crown owns the minerals only.
Aber - - - - -	<sup>a</sup> Nil	<sup>a</sup> 662
Llandegai - - - - -	Nil	Nil
Llanllechid - - - - -	Nil	5,893

Contract for Carriage of Mails from Bandbridge to Scarva.

MR. SLOAN (Belfast, S.): To ask the Postmaster-General what is the amount paid annually for the carriage of mails by road between Bandbridge and Scarva, county Down, Ireland; is the contract open for public competition; and, if not, can he say why.

(Answered by Mr. Sydney Buxton.) It is not the practice to publish the amounts paid for mail cart contracts. As regards the second part of the Question, I will have inquiry made and inform the hon. Member of the result.

Grants to Welsh Secondary Schools.

MR. BRIDGEMAN (Shropshire, Oswestry): To ask the President of the Board of Education how many secondary schools in Wales and Monmouth are receiving grants under Section 9 of the Welsh Intermediate Education Act as well as the ordinary secondary school grants; and what is the total amount of the two grants, respectively.

(Answered by Mr. Runciman.) It is anticipated that, of the ninety-four intermediate schools in aid of which the Treasury grant under Section 9 of the Welsh Intermediate Education Act, 1889, is payable, ninety-one schools will claim the grant for the school year 1907-8, and will also be entitled to grant under the regulations for secondary schools (Wales) for that year. The total Treasury grant for all intermediate schools for that year was estimated at £24,115 4s., and the aggregate grants under the regulations for secondary schools (Wales) for secondary schools, whether intermediate or not, for the same year was estimated at £53,831.

Discharges from Dockyards.

MR. W. T. WILSON (Lancashire, Westhoughton): To ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether instructions have been given in all departments of the Royal Dockyards, with the exception of the Works Department, that on account of the large number of unemployed workmen in the dockyard towns no workmen must be discharged; and, if so, whether he can state the reason why the Works Department has not been treated in the same manner as the other departments.

(Answered by Mr. McKenna.) No such instructions as are indicated in the hon. Member's Question have been issued to the dockyards.

Skilled Workmen doing Labourer's Work in the Central Parks.

MR. W. T. WILSON: To ask the First Commissioner of Works whether he is aware that there are a considerable number of workmen employed in the central parks doing the work of skilled mechanics who are only being paid labourers' wages, viz., 27s. per week; whether he is aware that skilled workmen are sometimes discharged and, in the course of a few days, re-engaged as labourers, and are almost immediately instructed to do the work of skilled artisans; and whether he will take steps to alter this state of affairs.

(Answered by Mr. L. Harcourt.) The Answer to the first paragraph is in the negative. In one instance only has a bricklayer been re-engaged as a labourer. He has once been employed on some rough brickwork; in future such work will be done by a bricklayer.

Vaccination Exemption Certificates—Case of Mr. B. Cornwall.

MR. LEHMANN (Leicestershire, Market Harborough): To ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he is aware that Mr. B. Cornwall, of London Farm, Isleham, Cambridgeshire, whose child was born on the 5th June, 1907, attended the Newmarket Court on the 1st October, 1907, to obtain exemption from vaccination, but found that, as the day had been set apart for Suffolk cases, his application could not be taken; that Mr. Cornwall had therefore to wait until the following week, the delay causing his application to be made three days beyond the limit of four months; whether Mr. Cornwall is now being pressed to have his child vaccinated; and whether, under the special circumstances of the case, he will instruct the vaccination officer not to prosecute Mr. Cornwall.

(Answered by Mr. John Burns.) The circumstances in which the parent found himself unable to make a statutory declaration before a magistrate within the prescribed time appear to be as stated. I understand that the parents are further considering the question of the vaccination of the child, and that probably now they will have the child vaccinated.

Old-Age Pensions—Charitable Gifts and Allowances.

MR. R. PEARCE (Staffordshire, Leek): To ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he is aware that certain Inland Revenue officers have been informing applicants for pensions that charitable gifts and allowances were a disqualification for the receipt of a pension; and whether such statements were made with the sanction of the Local Government Board.

(Answered by Mr. John Burns.) I have no information on this subject. The pension officers are not under my control, and no sanction on my part is necessary as regards any statements they may make to applicants for pensions.

The Albion Assurance Association.

MR. HUNT: To ask the President of the Board of Trade under what Act of Parliament the Albion Assurance Association, of Imperial Buildings, New Bridge Street, E.C., is established, and under what authority it is carrying on the business of insurance among the working classes.

(Answered by Mr. Churchill.) My attention has been called to this association which, from inquiries made, appears to be a voluntary organisation. The subject of the transaction by the association of insurance business is engaging the attention of the Board of Trade.

Foreign Patentees Establishing Works in Great Britain.

MR. SLOAN: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he can state the number of foreign patentees, together with the articles they manufacture, registered in England, and who are likely in future, in view of the Patents Act, to have such goods produced in Great Britain.

(Answered by Mr. Churchill.) The total number of owners of existing British patents who are foreigners is estimated by the Patent Office to be about 30,000. It is impossible to foretell what number of these patentees will, in consequence of the Patents Act, work their patents in this country; but it would appear from the accounts in the public press that several of them have already commenced such working, and that others are proposing to do so. I may add that several applications for revocation for non-working in this country are at present before the Comptroller.

The Board of Trade and Funicular and Cliff Railways.

MR. GIBBS (Bristol, W.): To ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he has any jurisdiction over funicular and cliff railways, and, if so, what.

(Answered by Mr. Churchill.) If a railway of either description were constructed by or under statutory authority and came within the meaning of the Regulation of Railways Acts the Board of Trade would have the same jurisdiction as they possess in regard to other railways opened or proposed to be opened for the public conveyance of passengers.

The Corporation of London and Spitalfields Markets.

MR. STUART SAMUEL (Tower Hamlets, Whitechapel): To ask Mr. Attorney-General whether the action upon the subject of the acquisition by the Corporation of London of the lessee's interest in Spitalfields Market, has yet been set down for trial; if not, when he anticipates that it will be so set down; and in the event of its being already entered for trial, when he anticipates that the trial will take place.

(Answered by Sir William Robson.) This action cannot be set down for trial until certain interlocutory matters have been disposed of. I am informed by the City Solicitor, who has the conduct of the case, that no time has been lost in proceeding with the matter during the vacation. The case is to come before the Master for directions on the 26th inst., and the City Solicitor hopes that the remaining interlocutory matters will not cause any considerable delay.

Commutation of Pensions.

SIR SEYMOUR KING (Hull, Central): To ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will state what is the total amount of public money that has been paid in respect of commutation of pensions since ing of the Pensions Commutation 1871; and if a Return could be had showing whether, under the regulations in force, the Ex- has profited or lost over the tions effected, and to what extent.

Answered by Mr. Lloyd-George.) The advanced from Savings Banks since the passing of the Pensions Act, 1871, up to the end of 1907, was £5,790,973 ls. In which the whole pension has commuted there is no record of the recent history of the pensioner or of the date of his death. It would, therefore, not be possible to prepare such a Return as is contemplated in the Bill.

Legislation Affecting the Blind in Ireland.

MR. SLOAN: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he intends to introduce legislation dealing with the blind in Ireland, if so, when.

Answered by Mr. Birrell.) I presume the hon. Member refers to legislation the lines of the Irish Education (Evicted Children) Bill, which was introduced by my predecessor two years ago. I should be very glad to introduce a Bill on the subject if I had any assurance that it would meet with general approval.

Evicted Tenants—Case of John Fitzgerald.

MR. WILLIAM ABRAHAM: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Estates Commissioners have received an application from John Fitzgerald, an evicted tenant on the Grehan estate, county Wick, for reinstatement in his holding at Kardstown, from which he was evicted in June, 1879; whether Michael Walsh, who has only occupied this farm since 1883, is merely a grazier; and whether, knowing that John Fitzgerald and his two sons are fully capable of working a farm properly, the Commissioners would seriously consider his claim.

Answered by Mr. Birrell.) The Estates Commissioners have received the application, and will consider it in due course. The proceedings appear to be pending.

before the Commissioners for the sale of the holding, and they are not in a position to state the tenure of the present occupant.

Use of Roman Catholic Schools at Bandbridge.

MR. SLOAN: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if the National Education Board have sanctioned the use of the Roman Catholic schools in Bandbridge, county Down, for the purpose of holding a dance on the 30th instant; and, if so, can he say on what grounds such permission has been given.

Answered by Mr. Birrell.) The Commissioners of National Education inform me that the schools in question are non-vested, and that they do not in any ordinary cases exercise any control over the use of non-vested schools on Sundays, or before or after the school hours on other days. No application for the use of these school-rooms for the purpose of a dance has been received by the Commissioners, and consequently no sanction has been given.

Record of Irish School Teachers' Attendances.

MR. SLOAN: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that the inspectors of schools in Circuit 7, Belfast, still insist on the teachers entering in the ordinary roll book not only the time of their arrival at school each day, but also the time of their departure; and whether, seeing that the National Board of Education have no rules or regulations authorising the inspectors to act in such a manner, and the fact that no such demand is made by other inspectors of schools, he will take steps to have such instructions withdrawn.

Answered by Mr. Birrell.) The Commissioners of National Education assume that in all national schools a record is kept of the teachers' attendance, and there is a query relating to this record in the form of return which the teacher of every national school is bound to have in readiness for the inspector on his visit. The Commissioners think that such a record is necessary, and they have no intention of withdrawing their query on the subject.

QUESTIONS IN THE HOUSE.

Rosyth Harbour.

MR. BRIDGEMAN (Shropshire, Oswestry): I beg to ask the Prime Minister if he will consider the advisability of proceeding more rapidly with the construction of Rosyth Harbour as a means of giving work to the unemployed.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Mr. McKenna, Monmouthshire, N.): The Prime Minister has asked me to take this Question. Tenders for this work which is to be done by contract have already been invited. The contract will contain a clause giving a bonus to the contractor for hastening the work.

Contracts for New Cruisers.

MR. RENWICK (Newcastle-on-Tyne): I beg to ask the Prime Minister whether he can further accelerate the placing of the contracts for the new cruisers, as a lengthened period must necessarily elapse between the placing of the orders and the actual time at which any considerable quantity of skilled and unskilled labour can be employed upon the vessels and their machinery and armament.

MR. McKENNA: The Prime Minister has asked me to take this Question. I have gone to the limits of possibility in expediting the orders for these cruisers.

The 5th Lancers.

MR. NIELD (Middlesex, Ealing): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether the report of Major-General Scobell upon the conduct of the five officers of the 5th Lancers who were placed upon half-pay was founded upon existing written reports from Colonel Graham, the officer commanding, or whether they depended, and in what respect, upon verbal communications between the two officers; will he say why reports upon the efficiency of officers are allowed to be forwarded to the Army Council which are not founded upon the written statement of the officer in command, and, further, why the five officers in question were judged in camera without any previous official communication being made to them as to what charge whether of breach of discipline or want of efficiency) was or had been made against them and without their being called upon for an explanation; and whether the Army Council object, and for what reason, to have public inquiry into the circumstances relating to the case of the officers of the 5th Lancers retired upon half pay.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. HALDANE, Haddington): The officer commanding the 5th Lancers reported in writing adversely on these five officers to the major-general commanding the 1st Cavalry Brigade. These adverse reports were in every instance communicated to the officers concerned and doubtless formed the basis of the general's reports. It is not only necessary but desirable that a general officer should consult with a commanding officer when the latter renders an unfavourable written report upon an officer. But once the general has formed his opinion of the officer in question and recorded it in writing, he is bound by regulation to communicate his written report to the officer. The adverse reports by the General Officer Commanding 1st Cavalry Brigade on the five officers were in each case communicated to the officers concerned. An officer who considers himself wronged by an adverse report has a statutory right to appeal against that report. When an officer exercises that right the appeal together with the unfavourable report are submitted for the decision of the Army Council. The object of convening a Court of Inquiry is to assist superior officers in eliciting information on any subject of an intricate or disputed nature. In the cases in question there are, in the opinion of the Army Council, no grounds for an inquiry.

Reports on Officers.

MR. NIELD: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether it is customary for the Army Council to act upon reports as to the personal conduct and fitness of individual officers which are not obtained officially and in writing.

MR. HALDANE: The reply is in the negative.

MR. NIELD: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether he will take steps to see that in future the principles of elementary justice are applied in dealing with officers in the same manner pursued in civilian cases, and that the only evidence which shall be acted upon by the Army Council in such matters should be in writing signed by the person responsible for the statement, and that such statement, in accordance with the regulations, shall be forwarded or shown to the officer in question before the matter is considered by the Army Council and an opportunity be given to him to lodge his reply in writing.

MR. HALDANE: The procedure proposed by the hon. Member is that laid down in the King's Regulations for the guidance of officers whose duty it is to report on officers under their command. If the hon. Member will look at the changes made in the Regulations he will find that his suggestions have already been carried out.

The New Howitzer.

MR. ASHLEY (Lancashire, Blackpool): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether the recent trials of the new howitzer have been satisfactory; and whether the new pattern gives more accurate shooting than the old gun.

I beg also to ask the Secretary of State for War whether the new howitzer is heavier or lighter than the gun it supersedes; and what approximately is its effective range.

MR. HALDANE: In reply to these Questions the new field howitzer is still under trial and it is not considered desirable to publish any results until the howitzer is approved. I think the hon. Member may safely assume that a new pattern will not be adopted unless it is in all respects superior to the old one.

*MR. ASHLEY: Is it intended that the new gun shall be substantially heavier than the old pattern?

MR. HALDANE: I would rather not go into details now.

Discharges from Government Factories.

MR. G. GOOCH (Bath): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War if he will state how many men have been discharged from the ordnance factories at Woolwich, Enfield, and Waltham, since 1st January, 1908; how many were discharged between the accession to power of the present Government and the end of 1907; and how many were discharged between the end of the South African War and the resignation of the late Government.

MR. HALDANE: The figures are as follows:—

	From 4th January to 10th October, 1908.	From 1st December, 1905, to 28th December, 1907.	From 1st June, 1902, to 30th November, 1905.
Woolwich - -	106	3,081	4,567
Enfield - -	18	88	1,252
Waltham Abbey -	30	139	453
	154	3,308	6,272

Although the reductions made by the late Government were very much larger, that was natural because it was very soon after the war, and I have no doubt we should have taken the same course.

The figure 154 is made up as follows: Men discharged prior to the order to stop discharges on reduction, 12; men discharged from building department and central office to which the principle of a minimum establishment does not apply, 85; men who left voluntarily, 51; men temporarily employed, 6. I may add that nobody has been discharged recently to whom the statement regarding discharges made some time ago would apply.

Royal Garrison Artillery—Promotion of Officers.

MR. ARTHUR LEE (Hampshire, Fareham): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether he has now further considered the question of stagnation of promotion amongst officers of the Royal Garrison Artillery; and, if so, whether he is in a position to state what steps he proposes to take to ameliorate the hard position in which the officers of this corps find themselves as a result of recent changes of military policy.

MR. HALDANE: The present state of promotion in the Royal Garrison Artillery has been receiving careful consideration, but I am not at present able to make any statement on the subject. It is, however, fully expected that in the near future the present rate of promotion will improve.

MR. ASHLEY: Will the right hon. Gentleman do everything in his power to make some announcement with regard to his proposals on this matter at the earliest possible date in order to avoid the resignation of a large number of these officers with an essentially high standard of attainments?

MR. HALDANE: I shall be glad to do it as soon as possible.

War Office Extensions on Salisbury Plain.

MR. GOULDING (Worcester): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether the Government propose to pay the tenants who have to give up their holdings in the new area in Salisbury Plain any compensation for disturbance, as contemplated by the Agricultural Holdings Act (Amendment), 1906.

MR. HALDANE: I can assure the hon. Member that tenants who may have to give up their holdings owing to the proposal to acquire land for an artillery range on Salisbury Plain, will get the usual compensation for improvements to which they may be entitled under the Agricultural Holdings Act. With regard to compensation for disturbance I would point out that good and sufficient cause can be shown for terminating existing tenancies upon land which is needed for a national purpose.

MR. GOULDING: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether he can state how many labourers are now employed on the farms to be acquired by the Government in the neighbourhood of Salisbury Plain; and what is the number of those aged sixty-five years and upwards.

MR. HALDANE: There are no statistics available to give the information required.

MR. GOULDING: But surely the right hon. Gentleman must realise the difficulty that labourers over sixty-five years of age will have in getting other employment? Is nothing to be done for them?

MR. HALDANE: I hope they will receive every consideration.

Horses for the Army.

MR. ASHLEY: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether in view of the serious decrease in the number of horses in the United Kingdom suitable for Army purposes, it is intended to provide in next year's Army Estimates a sum of money to encourage the breeding of such horses, which Austria-Hungary, Germany, and France promote by spending annually £300,000, £200,000, and £100,000, respectively.

MR. HALDANE: It is not possible at present to give the hon. Member any information on this subject beyond what I have already given to the House.

MR. ASHLEY: Can the right hon. Gentleman not give me some answer? When I put the Question to the President of the Board of Agriculture he refers me to the right hon. Gentleman,

When I ask him he will give no answer at all.

HALDANE: The hon. Gentleman is asking information as to the rates for next year. That I cannot give him.

Defence of Naval Arsenals.

ASHLEY: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether there is permanent armament in the land-ports forming the defences of the naval arsenals of Portsmouth, Plymouth, Devonport, and Chatham; if so, what is the nature of such armaments.

HALDANE: There is no permanent armament in the landward forts for the defence of our naval ports. Though it was originally intended that they should contain such armament, it is now held to be preferable to provide garrisons of the forts, which may be of considerable use for purposes of defence, with movable armament which can be used for mobile defence. The land ports mentioned are all in possession of their movable armament.

MR. ASHLEY: Am I to understand that these defences are practically of no use at all?

MR. HALDANE: On the contrary, they are held to be of more effect than if supplied with fixed guns.

MR. ASHLEY asked why Continental nations had these defences for their ports.

MR. HALDANE said that the recommendations of an extremely competent committee appointed by Lord Lansdowne to deal with this question had been carried out.

*MR. ARNOLD-FORSTER (Croydon) asked whether it was the fact that any east border fortresses in other countries had been strengthened by the removal of these armaments?

MR. HALDANE said he did not know what the arrangements as to these armaments were in other countries, but, being a Scotsman, he would ask the right hon. Gentleman another question—namely, why, if he held these views now, he did not in other days reverse the arrangement?

MR. ARNOLD-FORSTER: As an explanation, may I remind the right hon. Gentleman—

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order. There are 159 Questions on the Paper.

Territorial Battalions—Ambulance Section.

MR. CARLILE (Hertfordshire, St. Albans): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether in view of the desirability of having stretcher-bearers or an ambulance section with each Territorial battalion during manoeuvres while in brigade camp, he will modify the present arrangements under which these men work as an independent brigade unit, or whether he will require each battalion to furnish a stretcher-bearer or ambulance section for its own service in addition to the brigade unit.

MR. HALDANE: Regimental stretcher bearers, to the number of sixteen, are included in the establishment of a Territorial Infantry battalion. They are, as I have already informed the House, formed from the bandsmen, and are trained for the duty. Their organisation, training and duties are the same as in the Regular Army, and they are not organised as part of an independent brigade unit, but do duty with their own battalion.

The Unemployed and the Special Reserve.

MR. ARTHUR LEE: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether recruits from the ranks of the unemployed who join the Special Reserve, and who take the advantage of his offer to provide them during the winter months with weekly pay, free food, quarters, bedding, fuel, and light at the expense of the State, will be entitled subsequently to cancel any obligation to remain in the Reserve for the normal period of six years, or to render any further military service in the event of an emergency, on making a payment of £3 at the conclusion of their temporary employment or at any other time that may be more convenient to themselves.

MR. HALDANE: Any Special Reservist can always purchase his discharge for £3, provided that such discharges are not suspended by any national emergency.

MR. ARTHUR LEE asked whether under the exceptional circumstances the right hon. Gentleman could not revise the terms of enlistment in the interests of the State so that men should not be entitled to cancel their obligation to be called on active service in cases of emergency at so cheap a rate? And he would also ask—

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Gentleman must not forget that this is Question time, and not for debate.

Ammunition for Rifle Clubs.

MR. COURTHOPE (Sussex, Rye): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether he intends to supply service ammunition at cheap rates to rifle clubs; under what conditions and at what price such supply will be made; and whether any communications have passed between the War Office and the National Rifle Association on the subject.

MR. HALDANE: The details are under consideration at this moment.

Army Pensioners and the Colonies.

MR. DU CROS (Hastings): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether it is proposed to allow Army pensioners the option of commuting a portion of their pensions for the purpose of raising the capital necessary to enable them to proceed to British Colonies to find employment.

MR. HALDANE: I presume the hon. Member has in mind commutation at an earlier age than the existing regulations allow. This would involve a considerable charge upon the estimates of next year, and I am not in a position to make any promise or indeed to express any opinion on this difficult question without much consideration.

South African Garrison.

SIR GILBERT PARKER (Gravesend) I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether it is intended to consolidate the military forces in the different Colonies of South Africa and then to withdraw all British Regular troops, leaving the defence of South Africa to the local forces.

MR. HALDANE: No, Sir. There is no present intention of further reducing the South African garrison.

SIR GILBERT PARKER: Has the attention of the right hon. Gentleman been directed to a statement by Lord Methuen to the effect suggested in the Question?

MR. HALDANE: I saw a very brief report of the statement. I gathered it referred to reductions already announced rather than to future policy.

The Special Reserve.

CAPTAIN CRAIG (Down, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War if he can state what success has attended his recent appeal to the unemployed to join the new Territorial Force; how many men have presented themselves for enlistment; how many have been accepted; and how many of these are under seventeen years of age.

MR. HALDANE: May I venture to point out to the hon. and gallant Member that my so-called appeal referred to the Special Reserve and not to the Territorial Force. The figures for the last fortnight show an improvement of 200 each week over the figures for the corresponding weeks of last year. No figures as regards ages are reported weekly.

Territorial Field Artillery—Land Ranges.

MR. ASHLEY: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether any land ranges suitable for Territorial field artillery practice have been acquired within the last six months; and what negotiations, if any, are in progress with a view to purchase such ranges.

MR. HALDANE: No land artillery ranges suitable for Territorial field artillery have been acquired during the last six months. As the hon. Member is aware, negotiations are in progress for the acquisition of such a range on Salisbury Plain. The question of obtaining lands for such ranges in other parts of England has been and is still being fully considered, but matters have not yet reached the stage of definite negotiations.

MR. ASHLEY: Will the right hon. Gentleman say when he hopes to conclude the negotiations regarding the Salisbury Plain range?

MR. HALDANE: I shall be glad to do so as soon as possible.

Week-end Camps for Territorials.

MR. ASHLEY: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether any money has been specially allocated for the purpose of defraying the cost of week-end camps for Territorials, which form of training has been found most useful in the Northumbrian division; and, if not, will provision for this object be made in the future.

MR. HALDANE: The principle adopted from the beginning has been to leave the General Officers Commanding-in-Chief free in the allocation of their training grants, and I have no reason to think that the funds at the disposal of the Associations and of General Officers Commanding are not sufficient to provide for this form of training.

Woolwich Ordnance Factories— Discharges of Boys.

VISCOUNT HELMSLEY (Yorkshire, N.R., Thirsk): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether he is aware that, even when unemployment has reached an acute stage, nearly 50 per cent. of the boys in the Ordnance Factories at Woolwich should be discharged on attaining the age of twenty-one years; whether the period of notice of discharge given on Ordnance Factory Form 64 is only three weeks; whether the boys discharged have been taught any trade during their period of service which they could pursue after discharge; and what steps he proposes to take to ensure that a larger proportion of boys should be permanently retained after attaining the age of twenty-one.

MR. HALDANE: As the House is already aware, the boys employed in the Ordnance Factories may be divided into two classes: (a) Trade lads who on passing an examination are taught a trade which they can pursue after discharge; (b) unskilled lads who are not taught any regular trade but who are employed on work not requiring any trade instruction. Fifty per cent. of the lads in Class (a) may be retained on reaching the age of twenty-one, the number of lads admitted to this class being limited. All the lads in Class (b) are at present discharged on reaching the age of twenty-one as if retained they must be taken on as men, and the numbers being in excess of the approved establishment there are no vacancies for men. When the numbers have reached the approved establishment by wastage any vacancies can be filled by retaining boys who reach twenty-one. I may add that Form 64 is only a blank form filled in according to circumstances. All trade lads now get six months notice, and all the other lads know that they have to go at twenty-one.

LORD BALCARRES (Lancashire, Chorley): But is it not the fact that under Form 64 boys can be discharged at ten days or a fortnight's notice?

MR. HALDANE: I have the form here; it says nothing of the kind.

LORD BALCARRES: Does not the form issued of the last few days provide for the discharge of boys at twenty-one years of age at a fortnight's notice?

MR. HALDANE replied in the negative, and added some words which were inaudible in the Gallery.

Tents for Territorial Officers.

MR. COURTHOPE: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War if he will state what tent accommodation will be provided for officers of the Territorial Force during annual training under the new scale.

*MR. HALDANE: The tent accommodation is as follows:—Circular bell tents: one each per field officer and staff officer; one per two other officers. Mess tents: two marquees per Yeomanry regiment or Infantry battalion; one marquee per other unit.

MR. COURTHOPE: Does the right hon. Gentleman think he will secure the services of an increased number of young officers who are willing to devote their annual holiday to the training by reducing the accommodation provided for them?

[The reply was inaudible.]

Service Rifle Ammunition.

MR. COURTHOPE: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether, in their endeavour to secure a satisfactory ammunition for the service rifle, the War Office have taken advantage of the experience of manufacturing firms by carrying out trials with those types of ammunition of private manufacture which are universally acknowledged by experts to be the best at present obtainable.

MR. HALDANE: Yes, Sir. Private manufacturing firms have been invited to supply ammunition for trial, and some have complied with the invitation.

MR. COURTHOPE: Have any trials been conducted with this ammunition?

MR. HALDANE: When the ammunition has been supplied for trial I presume we are working with it.

EARL WINTERTON (Sussex, Horsham) asked as to ammunition for Canada for the Ross rifle.

MR. HALDANE said he believed the Ross Rifle Company manufactured their own ammunition.

Converted Rifles.

MR. COURTHOPE: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War how many long Lee-Enfield rifles have now been converted for the use of the Territorial Force; when the necessary total number will be completed; and when the converted rifles will be issued.

MR. HALDANE: 20,500 rifles have been converted. The date when the required number will be completed depends on the money available in future years, and cannot at present be estimated. It has not yet been decided when the converted rifle will be issued.

Special Reserve Establishment.

MR. ASHLEY: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether, at the present rate of recruiting, all vacancies in the establishment of the Special Reserve will be filled up during the winter; and whether he will raise the minimum age of enlistment to eighteen years with a view to securing the efficiency of the force.

MR. HALDANE: There are not as yet materials on which it is possible to say with the least degree of certainty what the rate of recruiting for the Special Reserve will be during the winter. So far it has gone up substantially, but this is all I can say. I am adverse to raising the age as suggested in the latter part of the Question, for reasons which I have more than once stated to the House.

MR. ASHLEY: If the right hon. Gentleman has no data to go upon, how can he say there will be room for 24,000 of the unemployed?

MR. HALDANE said the question was, would the increased rate of recruitment continue and would they get the 24,000 men they required.

MR. ASHLEY: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether, in the event of enlistment of 24,000 unemployed into the Special Reserve during the present winter, that force will be 8,202 over establishment, saving reductions caused by death, discharge, desertion, and enlistment into the Regular Army; and whether he intends to seek power to increase the establishment of the Special Reserve.

MR. HALDANE: The reply to the first part of the Question is in the negative. The wastage from all sources was estimated at about 8,000, and by adding this number to the present deficiency 00 the figure 24,000 was the probable number of ng the forthcoming winter. second part of the Question, the negative.

LEY: But suppose the is than the estimate of the ntleman?

AKER: That is a hypo- tion.

and Labourers for Southern Rhodesia.

ES (Montgomery Boroughs): ask the Under-Secretary of he Colonies whether official n Nyassaland for the mines Rhodesia is permitted without ion or stipulation as to non- it underground of labourers

UNDER-SECRETARY OF OR THE COLONIES (Colonel iverpool, Abercromby): The in the experimental gang d by the Seretary of State March last were to be sent certain specially inspected and might elect whether to as surface labourers or for derground.

REES: I beg to ask the Under- y of State for the Colonies : the Government is now practi- egulating the export of labour yassaland to Southern Rhodesia ; i so, whether labour cannot be ed in Nyassaland so as to provide cient and continuous supply for vice of local industries.

ONEL SEELY: The emigration der Government supervision. I stand that there is at present a surplus of labour in Nyassaland, at no question is likely to arise o a sufficient supply for local in- ries.

R. REES: I beg to ask the Under- etary of State for the Colonies ther he is aware that about 18,000 ives of Nyassaland emigrated last year to Southern Rhodesia as free and unrestricted emigrants, without any pro- vision being made for their comfort and accommodation on the march ; and whether, since free emigration cannot be prohibited, the Government will consider the advisability of organising the export of surplus labour, under satisfactory conditions, for the common benefit of Nyassaland and other regions in Central and Southern Africa.

COLONEL SEELY: 18,000 natives are estimated to have left Nyassaland last year, the bulk of whom went to Southern Rhodesia. I am now in- formed that the Government of Southern Rhodesia decided to take in hand the regulation of alien labour from the 1st instant. As I have stated in reply to another Question by my hon. friend, further consideration is being given to the question of the emigration of native labour from Nyassaland to other regions.

MR. REES: I beg to ask the Under- Secretary of State for the Colonies what is the authority for the statement made by Lord Elgin to Lord Selborne, as disclosed by the Blue Book published in April last, to the effect that no con- siderable number of natives of Nyassa- land are likely to find their way to the Rand as independent immigrants ; whether such independent immigrants are or are not now at liberty to travel through Southern Rhodesia to the Trans- vaal ; and whether, if the local ad- ministration does not control the surplus labour supply, there is any means of preventing its crossing the border into Portuguese territory, and there entering into engagements with the agents of the Witwatersrand Native Labour Association.

COLONEL SEELY: Lord Elgin's state- ment was based on the opinion of Sir Alfred Sharpe, with whom the question was carefully discussed when he was in this country last winter ; the subject matter of the latter part of my hon. friend's Question is receiving the atten- tion of the Secretary of State, with the object of ascertaining how far there has been any change in the circumstances.

Orange River Colony Loan.

SIR GILBERT PARKER: I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether the Government is favourably disposed to guarantee the proposed Orange River Colony Loan of £1,500,000; and, if so, will it give the House of Commons an opportunity of fully discussing the question before a final decision is reached.

COLONEL SEELY: I cannot add anything to my reply to the hon. Member's Question of the 19th, except that, in the event of any guarantee being given, an Act of Parliament would be required such as was passed in the case of the Transvaal guaranteed loans.

Transvaal War Casualties and Injuries Commission.

SIR GILBERT PARKER: I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies if he will give the names of the members of the War Casualties and Injuries Commission appointed by the Transvaal Government to inquire into and report upon the cases of all persons in indigent circumstances now domiciled in the Transvaal, who were resident in the Transvaal on or immediately before 11th October, 1899, who served under arms, either on the side of the Imperial Government or of the Government of the South African Republic, during the hostilities between those Governments; and whether he will give the names of the members of the South African Republic Officials' Pensions Commission appointed to consider the claims of those deprived of office as the result of the war.

COLONEL SEELY: The names are as follows: In the case of the first Commission, Mr. I. S. Ferreira (Member Legislative Assembly), President, Messrs. Dutoit (Member Legislative Council), Nicholson (Member Legislative Assembly) and Viljoen; in the case of the second Mr. A. D. Wolmarans (Member Legislative Council) Chairman, and Mr. D. Loveday (Member Legislative Assembly).

The Colonial Secretariat.

MR. BRIDGEMAN (Shropshire, Oswestry): I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies if the House will have any opportunity of ascertaining the extent and character of the work carried out by the Colonial secretariat established after the Conference of Colonial Ministers.

COLONEL SEELY: The secretarial staff of the Imperial Conference have been and are engaged on work which I trust will be of service to the Conference at its next meeting. I shall be glad to make a statement on the subject when occasion offers.

British Indians in the Transvaal.

MR. J. M. ROBERTSON (Northumberland, Tyneside): I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether in view of the expressions of popular indignation in India at the recent treatment of British-Indians in the Transvaal, His Majesty's Government have taken any steps towards remedying the grievances in question.

COLONEL SEELY: His Majesty's Government are well aware of the sympathy which has been excited by allegations of ill-treatment of British Indians in the Transvaal, and they are in communication on the subject with the Colonial Government, who, they feel assured, have no desire to take legislative or administrative measures involving unnecessary harshness. The Secretary of State has been in friendly communication with the Transvaal Government on this subject, and a considerable number of concessions have already been made. The principal remaining grievance of the Indians is, as I understand, their fear that they may not secure a supply of professional men to attend to their wants, and the Secretary of State is in communication with the Transvaal Government with a view to ascertain whether it is not possible to secure what is wanted by means of administrative action. I have hope that the representations of the Secretary of State may not be without effect.

*MR. REES: Is the contention that the Transvaal Government promised to repeal the Act complained of admitted?

COLONEL SEELY: No, Sir, the statement is made on one side and denied on the other.

Dinizulu.

ARNESS (Berkshire, New-to ask the Under-Secretary for the Colonies whether he can length of time during which been kept in prison in trial; whether a date fixed for his trial; and, he will place in the Library
a copy of the indictment Dinizulu will be tried and the Natal Parliament constitutional by which he is to be describing the procedure to at the trial.

SEELY: Dinizulu was December, and the Special Court is to try him will open on 2nd November. The indictment not yet been received, but the Court will be asked for a copy. The Special Court Bill will be No. 4195. It was passed, with minor alterations specified at the end of the Parliamentary Paper which has just been published.
under which the Court has power under Section 21 of the Act
I presume, so far have been that we have telegraphed for the order to be forwarded as soon as

Native Land in South African Protectorates.

WEDGWOOD (Newcastle-under-Lyme): I beg to ask the Under-Secretary for the Colonies, with reference to the unification of South Africa and possible incorporation in the United Kingdom of the protectorates of Basutoland and Bechuanaland, whether he will see that the native interests are permanently protected by making the complete nonalienation of the land of those protectorates a sine qua non of the exercise of direct Imperial control.

COLONEL SEELY: My hon. friend will doubt aware that an Act of the Imperial Parliament would be necessary to effect a new Constitution in South Africa. I think, therefore, it would be a mistake to anticipate the proposals for unification or federation which may arise from the important Convention which is in session at Durban. It would, in the opinion of the Secretary of State, be most unwise to interfere in the deliberation of that Assembly, but I can assure my hon. friend that His Majesty's Government are fully conscious of the importance of the maintenance of obligations to the native population. I should add that there is abundant evidence that the delegates to this Convention are not unmindful of the great issues involved in this and kindred matters.

MR. WEDGWOOD: Will the Government be careful in any action they take not to surrender the interests of the natives and to prevent the alienation of their lands?

COLONEL SEELY: I think that is indicated in the Answer I have just read.

MR. ASHLEY asked if a like course would be taken in regard to the natives of Swaziland.

COLONEL SEELY: The Government will adhere to their declaration of policy.

MR. WEDGWOOD: It is too late in the case of Swaziland; the lands have already been alienated.

COLONEL SEELY: This amounts

Foreign Office Returns.

MR. R. HARCOURT (Montrose Burghs): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether Reports can be obtained from His Majesty's representatives in the principal protected foreign countries and summarised for presentation to Parliament in a shape similar to the Return, No. 301, entitled Speeches (Time Limit), recently issued, showing to what extent, if any, party machinery has recently been utilised (with due allowance for constitutional differences) in assisting the progress of measures promoted by any company, trust, cartel, or syndicate when such measures do not form part of the Government programme.

THE UNDER - SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Mr.
McKINNON WOOD, Glasgow, St. Rollox):
My right hon. friend does not think it would be possible to obtain a Report which would be of any value.

The "Lady Kensington."

MR. H. H. MARKS (Kent, Thanet): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the Government has received information of the seizure by the Venezuelan authorities of the steamship "Lady Kensington," and of the arrest and imprisonment of her passengers and crew, and whether he can state what action will be taken in the matter.

MR. MCKINNON WOOD: His Majesty's Government have already been informed of the alleged detention of the "Lady Kensington"; but the particulars furnished are so incomplete that the Governor of the Windward Islands, who is in direct communication with His Majesty's Minister at Caracas, has been requested to make further inquiries into the matter.

Mr. Grayson's Speech.

EARL WINTERTON (Sussex, Horsa-ham): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if the attention of the police has been called to a speech, made by the hon. Member for Colne Valley, on Saturday, the 17th instant, to the unemployed in which he is alleged to have urged them to steal; and, if so, whether any action is to be taken in connection with it.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (MR. GLADSTONE, Leeds, W.): Yes, Sir. The attention of the Commissioner of Police has been called to the speech, and he has considered the question of taking proceedings, but he thinks, and I agree with him, that it is not necessary to do so on this occasion. If, however, there should be further incitements of the same character in circumstances where they might lead to crime or disorder, I fear it will be necessary to take the usual proceedings with a view to the hon. Member being bound over.

Cartridge Manufacturers' Regulations.

MR. FELL (Great Yarmouth): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he is aware that British manufacturers of ammunition are placed at a disadvantage compared with German in consequence of the latter being allowed to sell in this country cartridges containing a powerful priming composition which English manufacturers are only allowed to use under regulations of the Home Office, which render business on a commercial scale impracticable; and whether he can alter such regulations or prevent the introduction of such foreign cartridges under the special circumstances prevailing.

MR. GLADSTONE: Safety cartridges, that is, cartridges so closed that the explosion of one cannot spread to another, are allowed to be imported to this country without licence, as there is no danger in their conveyance or storage; but their manufacture is dangerous, and is therefore subject to regulations. These regulations have been framed with much care, and are not generally of such a character as to stand in the way of the manufacture of safety cartridges on a commercial scale; but if any manufacturer can show that they bear hardly on any particular class of cartridge, I shall be glad to consider, after inquiry by the Explosives Department, whether it is possible, consistently with the safety of the workpeople, to allow any relaxation of the existing requirements.

Unemployed Committees and the Unemployed Fund.

MR. ELLIS DAVIES (Carnarvonshire, Eifion): I beg to ask the Prime Minister whether it is proposed to modify the rule which now prevents the Local Government Board from giving assistance out of the Unemployed Fund to county councils who, unable under Section 2 (2) of the Unemployed Act, 1905, to appoint a distress committee, have appointed an unemployed committee under Section 2 (3) of the Act.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (MR. JOHN BURNS, Battersea): Perhaps I may be allowed to answer some of the Questions put to the Prime Minister on the subject of the Unemployed. With regard to the Question of my hon. friend I may state that payments out of the grant are only made to and distress committees under the Unemployed Workmen Act are the bodies empowered to provide or contribute to work. Committees appointed under subsection (3) of Section 1 possess these powers. Their powers are limited to the collection of information with respect to the conditions within their area and the provision of information when required.

Committee Regulations.

MR. CROFT : I beg to ask the Minister whether it is proposed that committees, working under the provisions of the Unemployed Workmen Act, be empowered, if necessary, to extend the working period of sixteen weeks to a period of twelve months; and within what limits.

MR. JOHN BURNS (Norwich) : I beg to ask the Prime Minister if it is intended to revise the regulations in respect of removing the restriction by which the period of work provided under the Unemployed Workmen Act is limited to sixteen weeks a year.

MR. JOHN BURNS : I will answer these questions together. It is not proposed to alter the regulation referred to. As it is, the restriction can be relaxed in certain cases with the consent of the Government Board, and in some cases this consent has already been given.

Urban Distress Work.

MR. CLYNES (Manchester, N.E.) : I beg to ask the Prime Minister whether any grants will be made to local authorities in aid of schemes for the relief of the unemployed in districts which may have put a hand for the relief of the unemployed, but where no distress committees have been or can be created under the regulations previously applied.

MR. JOHN BURNS : The grant is made for expenses under the Unemployed Workmen Act, and consequently payments can only be made from it when a local body or distress committees have been set up under that Act.

Help for Unemployed Women.

MR. CLYNES : I beg to ask the Prime Minister whether the Government has considered and decided upon any means whereby unemployed women may benefit under the Government's proposals; and whether any restraints previously imposed on local authorities in respect of women's work will be discontinued.

MR. JOHN BURNS : It is competent for the distress committee for any district in which there is exceptional distress to submit a scheme of work for unemployed women to the Local Government Board, who will be prepared to consider it. No special restrictions have been imposed in respect of such schemes, and the Board have already made a payment this year from the grant in respect of a scheme of women's work in London.

The Relief Grant.

MR. SUMMERBELL (Sunderland) : I beg to ask the Prime Minister whether grants to local authorities in aid of schemes for the relief of the unemployed will be actually limited to the difference in cost by employing the unemployed instead of workmen normally engaged in the particular kind of work put in hand.

MR. JOHN BURNS : Payments from the grant will not be made to the local authorities, but to the distress committees. Where a distress committee contributes out of monies derived from the grant to the cost of works carried out by a local authority, the amount of the contribution will usually be limited in the manner referred to in the Question.

The Post Office and the Unemployed— The Central Telegraph Office.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND (Clare, E.) : I beg to ask the Postmaster-General what are the conditions governing the employment of temporary hands in the Central Telegraph Office and postal service generally; is it the case that a number of these men, known as season substitutes, are, in accordance with certain regulations, to be dispensed with at the end of the present month; in view of the crisis of unemployment now prevalent, will he take such steps as may result in the retention of as many of these men as possible until the winter?

season has passed, especially having regard to the fact that it is much more economical to employ such men as substitutes against overtime, sick absence, and annual leave, than the performance of these duties by overtime by the established staff; and will he consider in this connection the need for clerks in other branches of his Department, such as the postal and engineering, which could be met by the temporary employment of some of the permanent staff of the Central Telegraph Office and so create temporary vacancies in that office for a number of men who will otherwise be unemployed until next summer.

THE POSTMASTER-GENERAL (Mr. SYDNEY BUXTON, Tower Hamlets, Poplar): Persons employed temporarily in the Post Office are, as a rule, engaged to meet special pressure at particular times of year, and it is made clear to them that they will not be retained when their services are no longer required. A number of persons have been employed temporarily during the past summer to meet the pressure which occurs in certain work at that season; and I am in hopes of finding employment for some of them from the middle of November until Christmas as temporary sorters. The hon. Member may rest assured that the whole matter has my sympathetic attention, and, without endorsing his particular proposal, I may say that no opportunity will be neglected of creating additional outlets which may mitigate the hardship of suspension of employment at the present season.

Christmas Pressure in the Post Office.

MR. BRIDGEMAN: I beg to ask the Postmaster-General what has been the number of men employed at Christmas by the Post Office in excess of the regular staff in each of the last five years.

The following Questions also appeared on the Paper on the same subject:—

MR. CLAUDE HAY (Shoreditch, Hoxton): To ask the Postmaster-General for how many weeks at Christmastide he proposes to employ the extra staff of 8,000 men to be drawn from the unemployed of London; and what their average weekly wage will be.

MR. CLAUDE HAY: To ask the Postmaster-General how many extra men have been employed by the Postal Department in London at Christmastide during the years 1905, 1906, and 1907, respectively.

MR. FELL: To ask the Postmaster-General how many extra men have been employed temporarily by his Department at Christmas-time in each of the past three years; and how many men it is proposed to employ at the coming Christmas.

MR. PIKE PEASE (Darlington): To ask the Postmaster-General what number of men will be employed at Christmastide in excess of those employed last year at the Post Office.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON: The number of extra hands employed at Christmastide as sorters, postmen, porters, and messengers in London during the last few years has been as follows, in round numbers:—1904, 7,000; 1905, 7,250; 1906, 7,400; 1907, 7,700; and this year they will number 8,000, a number which I hope to be able somewhat to increase by a further reduction in the overtime worked. These hands are employed, for the most part, from two to six weeks, with a certain number up to fourteen weeks. The fixed week's wage for adults for an eight-hours day was raised last year from 20s. to 24s. and besides this they will receive additional payment, apart from overtime, for the specially heavy work on Christmas Day and Boxing Day. I have no figures available as regards the provinces, but the total number employed will be considerable. Last Christmas, as stated by the Prime Minister on Wednesday, special efforts were made to utilise wholly unemployed men; and particular attention is being given to the carrying out of this policy for the coming Christmas. The same system will also, as far as practicable, be extended to the provinces as well.

MR. BRIDGEMAN: Then we are to understand that the increased number employed this year will be 300 in London and none in the provinces.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON: I hope the increase will be greater in London. I have no figures as to the provinces.

*MR. KEIR HARDIE (Merthyr Tydvil): What proportion will be employed a fortnight, and how many for six weeks?

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON: I cannot give the figures offhand.

The Post Office and the National Telephone Company.

SIR JOHN TUKE (Edinburgh and St. Andrew's Universities): I beg to ask the Postmaster-General whether he has taken further steps towards bringing about the inclusion of the discharged members of the construction staff of the National Telephone Company in the permanent staff of the Post Office.

The following Questions on the same subject were answered at the same time:—

MR. CHIOZZA MONEY (Paddington, N.): To ask the Postmaster-General if the National Telephone Company, Limited, in order to keep down new capital expenditure, have largely reduced their canvassing staff, and are even neglecting new business sent to them; and, if so, whether he can see his way, by making a suitable agreement with the Company, to prevent the further contraction of business and discharge of employees.

MR. CHIOZZA MONEY: To ask the Postmaster-General if he will state precisely how many of the discharged employees of the National Telephone Company, Limited, he has taken into the employ of the Post Office telegraph or telephone services.

MR. H. C. LEA (St. Pancras, E.): To ask the Postmaster-General if he will guarantee to take over any member of the staff of the National Telephone Company, Limited, who is paid off on account of the work being reduced in consequence of the company being taken over by his Department in 1911.

MR. H. C. LEA: To ask the Postmaster-General if he will make such arrangements with the National Telephone Company, Limited, as shall enable the Company to carry on the laying down of new plant and replacement work regardless of the transfer of the business of the company to his Department in 1911, so that the present staff of the company shall not suffer by being discharged and the public not be incommoded by the telephone service being hindered in its normal state of development.

MR. CLAUDE HAY: To ask the Postmaster-General whether, having regard to the number of persons, other than employees of the National Telephone Company, who are thrown out of employment or will lose their employment by the dismissals, actual and announced, of the employees of the company, he will arrange with the National Telephone Company to suspend all dismissals and notices of dismissals pending the negotiations he has announced as being in course between his Department and that company.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON: As I have already stated in this House, applications for employment in the Post Office from men discharged by the National Telephone Company are being met so far as work can be found, and 105 have been so engaged during the last six months. I cannot, of course, give a general undertaking to employ any men who may be discharged by the company for the reason stated, nor can I control the action of the company in this respect. I understand that the company have not reduced their canvassing staff to any large extent, and they assure me that they are prepared to meet all applications for new lines under ordinary conditions, and have not refused such applications. I understand, indeed, from the company that the discharges which have so far taken place, apart from those due to misconduct or incompetence, or to the termination of temporary employment or employment for certain special purposes, have been mainly caused by an exceptional falling off in orders obtained from the public, consequent on the recent depression of business throughout the United Kingdom. Arrangements between the Post Office and the company are under consideration which will, I hope, enable such works of construction as may be required for the service after 1911 to be continued uninterruptedly.

MR. H. C. LEA asked whether the right hon. Gentleman was aware that the statement he had just made was not borne out by the fact that men were being discharged by the National Telephone Company, thus adding to the great army of unemployed in London.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON said he must accept the assurance of the National Telephone Company.

MR. WATT (Glasgow, College): Is it not the fact that they have dismissed their canvassers, and are not now canvassing for business?

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON said he understood they had not reduced their canvassing staff to any large extent and that the falling off in orders was due to the falling off in business.

MR. CHIOZZA MONEY: Then why is it necessary for the right hon. Gentleman to make special arrangements with the company?

*MR. SYDNEY BUXTON said that in the next three years it might be hardly to the interest of the company to extend their system. He hoped to be able to come to an arrangement with them, so that together they might be able to carry on necessary construction work uninterruptedly.

Trafalgar Day.

CAPTAIN CRAIG: I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works if he can state why the national flag was not flown on the National Portrait Gallery on Trafalgar Day; and whether he is aware of the universal desire throughout the country to honour the memory of the hero of that engagement.

MR. J. MACVEAGH (Down, S.): May I ask whether this Question was not handed in at the Table the day before Trafalgar Day, and whether the right hon. Gentleman concludes from that fact that the hon. and gallant Member for South Down does not know what day Trafalgar Day is?

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (Mr. L. HARCOURT, Lancashire, Rossendale): I think there was an element of intelligent anticipation. The responsibility for the National Portrait Gallery in this matter rests with the director. It has never been the custom to fly flags on public buildings on Trafalgar Day. The Nelson Column was as usual admirably decorated. I do not think it desirable unduly to extend the area of anniversary decorations, and I cannot believe that the honour in which Lord Nelson's memory is held would be better served by an increased display of bunting.

Buckingham Palace and Unemployment.

MR. H. C. LEA: I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works whether, in view of the large number of painters and house decorators now amongst the unemployed in London, he could see his way to afford some of them immediate employment by giving Buckingham Palace a couple of coats of paint.

MR. L. HARCOURT: No money has been voted by Parliament for the painting of Buckingham Palace, and I am unable to put such work in hand.

Afforestation in Ireland.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND: I beg to ask the Vice-President of the Department of Agriculture (Ireland) whether the Estates Commissioners have been authorised by the Treasury to purchase in the interests of State reafforestation woods and forests on estates sold in Ireland under the Purchase Acts; and whether this is being done at present.

THE VICE-PRESIDENT OF THE DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE FOR IRELAND (Mr. T. W. RUSSELL, Tyrone, S.): I presume the hon. Member desires to ask whether the Department has been authorised to purchase woods from the Estates Commissioners as they to their possession. The answer is negative, but negotiations with the Admiralty are pending and the Department has in the meantime purchased from the Commissioners the woods of Lismore and Camolin in Tipperary and Oxford at a cost of something like £10,000.

WILLIAM REDMOND asked what progress had been made towards carrying out the recommendations of the Royal Commission on Afforestation which sat last year in Ireland, and whether it was a fact that the findings of that Commission had the approval of the Government on behalf of the public.

T. W. RUSSELL said it was a fact that they had the approval of the whole of the public, but he could not add anything to what he had said.

WILLIAM REDMOND said that in view of the urgency of the question he would again call attention to it at an early date.

Unemployment in Ireland.

JOHN O'CONNOR (Kildare, N.): I beg to ask the Prime Minister whether, in making inquiries on the subject of unemployment, he ascertained the condition of large urban localities in Ireland in respect to unemployment; whether, in the administration of the Unemployment fund and its application to the relief of poor localities, Ireland shall be included in the scheme propounded; whether the amount allocated to the Admiralty by the Admiralty regulations concerning unemployment will have been added more to the extent of such inquiries in districts affected than to the improvement of the respective dockyards.

THE PRIME MINISTER AND FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. ASQUITH, London, E.): I am not in a position to give particulars as to the extent of unemployment in Ireland, but my right hon. friend will, of course, be glad to consider any representations that may be made to him. In distributing the work between the respective dockyards, the nature of the work requiring to be done with and the resources of the dockyards concerned, have had to be borne in mind. The needs of Haulbowline Yard have, as I am informed, been considered in every possible way consistent with these objects.

CAPTAIN DONELAN (Cork, N.): I asked whether, in the allocation of the £300,000 referred to in the statement of the right hon. Gentleman on Wednesday last, due regard would be taken of the fact that this was the only Government dockyard in Ireland, and that Ireland would not derive any benefit whatever from the large expenditure on ship-building?

MR. JOHN O'CONNOR asked whether Ireland was to be left out of the distribution of funds, and whether any relief that country received was to depend entirely on the representations it might be prepared to make to the Government.

MR. ASQUITH: Any representations from any local authority in Ireland or any other body will receive the most careful and attentive consideration.

Government Orders Abroad.

MR. R. DUNCAN (Lanarkshire, Govan): I beg to ask the Prime Minister if it is an instruction to the spending Departments that as far as practicable orders for work to be done shall be placed in the United Kingdom rather than abroad until employment at home is in a satisfactory state.

MR. ASQUITH: There is no general instruction to the Departments, but, as a matter of fact, the amount of work which they place outside the United Kingdom is exceedingly small.

Unemployed v. Contract Labour.

MR. MILDMAI (Devonshire, Totnes): I beg to ask the Prime Minister whether, under his unemployed proposals, there will be any and, if so, what check upon municipal authorities in the exercise of the power to be conferred upon them of engaging the services of the unemployed in substitution for contract labour at the cost of the Exchequer.

MR. ASQUITH: No new power will be conferred upon local authorities to engage the services of the unemployed when carrying out works. It will rest with them as at present to determine to what extent they will make use of unemployed labour. The Parliamentary grant is voted "for contributions in aid of expenses under the Unemployed Workmen Act," and consequently payments from it can only be made to the local bodies under the Act, viz., the Central (Unemployed) Body in London, and distress committees elsewhere. The administration of the grant in England and Wales is controlled by my right hon. friend the President of the Local Government Board, and in making payment from the grant in respect of the deficiency arising from the use of unemployed labour only a reasonable proportion of this deficiency is allowed, but regard is had to the circumstances of each particular case.

Imperial Grant to Local Authorities.

MR. CAVE (Surrey, Kingston): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury if he can give an approximate estimate of the loss to local authorities which it is proposed to pay out of Exchequer grants, arising from the relative unproductivity of labour of unemployed workmen as distinguished from work carried out under contract by regular labourers.

MR. ASQUITH: The loss referred to only arises in the case of work for which there is no adequate supply of unemployed labour from persons normally employed in work of that kind. The loss to local authorities caused by employing workmen who are on the registers of distress committees, instead of having the work carried out under contract, is estimated as varying from 5 per cent. up to 40 or 50 per cent. of the cost of the labour. The actual amount of the extra expenditure involved in any particular case must depend largely upon the nature of the work and the efficiency of the supervision exercised. No hard-and-fast rule has been laid down as to the percentage which a distress committee may be authorised to contribute out of the grant, but usually not more than 30 per cent. would be regarded as proper for this purpose.

MR. CURRAN (Durham, Jarrow) asked whether this grant would be distributed in accordance with the scheme which the right hon. Gentleman laid before the House, or in accordance with the Act as it stood?

MR. ASQUITH: In accordance, no doubt, with the Act as it stands, but in accordance with the regulations as modified in the manner I have indicated.

MR. CURRAN: Will the right hon. Gentleman place before the House the extent to which these restrictions will be removed so far as immediate purposes are concerned?

MR. ASQUITH: I have already indicated the relaxations in the regulations which will take place.

MR. CLYNES: Can the right hon. Gentleman say the extent of the loss suffered by unemployment by those who are not of the working classes?

MR. ASQUITH: That is rather a large question.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR (City of London) Do I understand the right hon. Gentleman to say that all he proposes to do in relation to the Act of 1905 is to modify the regulations which, under the Act, are capable of modification from time to time by the Local Government Board, but not to alter any of the substantive provisions of the Act by fresh legislation?

MR. ASQUITH: We do not propose to introduce legislation.

MR. HAROLD COX (Preston) asked whether he understood from the Answer of the right hon. Gentleman that if the efficiency of the supervision was bad, a larger percentage of grant would be made from the Imperial Exchequer.

MR. ASQUITH: What I said was that, where there was an adequate supply of unemployed labour of persons nominally employed in a particular industry, it would go to those people and no such question would arise. That is a very important point which some people have not sufficiently borne in mind. But where, as is often the case, you have to employ persons not specially fitted, who have had no previous industrial training for the work, then, and then only, will this subvention, if I may so call it, from Imperial funds come in, and, as to that, adequate supervision is to be exercised.

Overtime in Government Departments.

MR. CLYNES: I beg to ask the Prime Minister whether instructions can be issued to the different Government Departments systematically to reduce long hours of work or abolish overtime where such may now exist; and whether the various Government contractors will also be pressed to adopt this course with a view to increasing opportunities for work for men now unemployed.

MR. ASQUITH: It is the practice of the Government Departments to resort to overtime only in the interests of the public service and to meet some pressing emergency. Under existing conditions, the hon. Member may be quite sure that every care will be taken not to resort to it unless in a case of clear necessity. It has not been found practicable to lay down any fixed rule in regard to this matter in Government contracts.

The Extent of Unemployment.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury if he will give the best estimate in his power of the number of unemployed in England, Scotland, Ireland and Wales, respectively, distinguishing between those who are classified as skilled and unskilled, and specifying the principal trades affected and the principal localities where unemployment is serious.

MR. ASQUITH: I regret that the information at the disposal of His Majesty's Government does not enable me to give any trustworthy statistical estimate of the nature asked for. Such information as is available as to the state of employment in various trades and districts is contained in the Board of Trade Labour Gazette, published on the 16th of this month. I may, however, say that the principal trades in which employment is specially bad include shipbuilding, engineering building, pottery and, in some districts, dock labour. The districts most affected include the Clyde, the North-East Coast of England and the Potteries. Among large towns from which distress is specially reported are Glasgow, Liverpool, Manchester, Sunderland, the Hartlepoons, Coventry, Sheffield, Leeds, and Bradford. The dispute in the cotton trade is also causing a good deal of distress in Lancashire.

MR. GOULDING asked the right hon. Gentleman whether he was aware that a census of unemployed had been directed to be undertaken in Berlin and other great centres of industry in November, December, January, and February next, and whether, in view of the fact that no reliable information was possessed by the Board of Trade, he would institute a similar census here.

MR. ASQUITH: I will consult the Board of Trade.

MR. CHIOZZA MONEY asked whether it was not possible to instruct the Board of Trade to analyse the last census returns with regard to occupations and to collate the number of unemployed as returned by the trade unions so far as they related to similar trades, and thus arrive at a reasonable estimate.

MR. ASQUITH: I will put that suggestion also before the Board of Trade.

MR. AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN (Worcestershire, E.): Can the right hon. Gentleman give any information as to the special reasons for distress in towns like Bradford and Coventry which are not concerned with any of the trades he has mentioned?

MR. ASQUITH: I cannot say offhand. I should like notice of the Question.

MR. BYLES (Salford, N.): Does Manchester include Salford?

MR. ASQUITH: For this purpose it does.

Canals.

MR. BOTTOMLEY (Hackney, S.): I beg to ask the Prime Minister whether it is the intention of the Government to redeem the pledge given by the late

Prime Minister with reference to dealing with the canals of the country; and, if so, whether, having regard to the amount of unemployment now prevailing, he will expedite matters in that direction.

MR. ASQUITH: As a first step towards carrying out the announcement made by the late Prime Minister a Royal Commission was appointed to inquire into the whole question of inland waterways. The Commission is still at work, and I am informed by the chairman that their recommendations will not be available at any rate before the middle of next year.

The Irish Shipyards.

CAPTAIN CRAIG: I beg to ask the Prime Minister if he can inform the House what provision it is the intention of the Government to make for meeting the distress at present existing in Ireland owing to want of employment; and will a proportion of the Admiralty's shipbuilding and repairs programme be allocated to Belfast and Derry shipyards.

MR. ASQUITH: I am afraid that I can add nothing at the moment to the statement that I made last Wednesday. The Admiralty carry out all their repair work in the Royal Dockyards. With regard to the ships to be built by contract this year, Messrs. Harland and Wolff, of Belfast, have been invited to tender for one of the new cruisers.

Congestion in Ireland.

MR. WILLIAM O'BRIEN (Cork): I beg to ask the Prime Minister whether the announcement that it is impossible at this stage of the session that any Bill dealing with congestion in Ireland should be expected to pass either House of Parliament represents the settled view of the Government.

MR. ASQUITH: It is the intention of the Government as soon as possible to introduce proposals in regard to this matter, but until we see what degree of acceptance these proposals meet, not only here but in other quarters, I should prefer to say nothing definite as to their Parliamentary prospects.

Unemployment in Wales.

*MR. REES: I beg to ask the Prime Minister whether, in the administration of the funds to be made available for the unemployed, the wants of towns in central Wales will receive due consideration.

MR. ASQUITH: I have no doubt that my right hon. friend the President of the Local Government Board will be prepared to make payments from the grant to the distress committee of any place in Wales in which there is exceptional distress, and useful work would be provided.

The Unemployment Debate.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I beg to ask the Prime Minister whether it is not the fact that, in consequence of the course the debate must take, there will be five speeches at least before any member of the Party which brought in and passed the Act, the application of which we have to discuss to-night, will have an opportunity of addressing the House, and whether, in view of that fact, and also the fact that no speeches are adequately reported after an unfortunately early hour, he can see his way to carrying over the debate to another day. I do not ask the right hon. Gentleman to give an answer now, because he will perhaps wait to see how the debate goes before the appeal can receive its full force. But I am so clearly of opinion that one night is not adequate that I shall certainly vote against the suspension of the eleven o'clock rule.

MR. ASQUITH: I think the House will agree that the Government have given the earliest possible opportunity for the discussion of this very important matter, recognising, as they do, its urgency. At the same time the House must remember that what we are discussing is not in the nature of a permanent solution, but merely the step to be taken for the moment to deal with a particular emergency. I think that with the suspension of the eleven o'clock rule adequate time ought to be afforded for the discussion. The Government are really not able to give another day without curtailing the space which they think ought reasonably to intervene between the Committee and the report stage of the Licensing Bill. In these circumstances we must move the suspension of the eleven o'clock rule.

SELECTION (STANDING COMMITTEES).

Sir WILLIAM BRAMPTON GURDON reported from the Committee of Selection; That they had discharged the following Member from Standing Committee A. (in respect of the Tuberculosis Prevention (Ireland) Bill): Mr. Devlin; and had appointed in substitution (in respect of the said Bill): Mr. Mooney.

Sir WILLIAM BRAMPTON GURDON further reported from the Committee;

That they had discharged the following Member from Standing Committee C. (in respect of the Coal Mines (Eight Hours) (No. 2) Bill): Mr. Baldwin.

Reports to lie upon the Table.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE (UNEMPLOYMENT).

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Proceedings on the Motion relating to Unemployment, if under discussion at Eleven o'clock this night, be not interrupted under the Standing Order (Sittings of the House)."—(Mr. Asquith.)

The House divided:—Ayes, 228; Noes, 68. (Division List No. 289.)

AYES.

Abraham, William (Cork, N.E.)

UNEMPLOYMENT.

*MR. ALDEN (Middlesex, Tottenham) in moving—"That this House welcomes the statement of the Prime Minister with regard to the national importance of the problem of unemployment, and approves of the steps proposed to be taken by the Government to meet the present emergency," desired to say how profoundly he was impressed with the change in public opinion during the last few months. They all rejoiced at that change, and they all hoped that it would lead at no distant date to the ing of some steps towards the permanent solution of this difficult problem. He wished to approach this question from a non-Party point of view. He feared it was not altogether possible, but he was convinced that every man in that House was in sympathy with the genuine aspiration of the working man for honourable and useful employment, and that on all sides of the House they were agreed that some steps should be taken in order to supply him with such employment. He wished he could agree with the hon. Member opposite who was going to move an Amendment which implied that some fiscal reform would bring about a solution of this problem. He could not say that his observation, extending over a good few countries, enabled him to come to that conclusion. He had lately come back from Canada and the United States, where he found a very great deal of serious unemployment. He had talked with labour leaders with the view of ascertaining their views on the subject and almost without exception they were of opinion that protection was no remedy. Mr. Post, a Labour leader in Chicago, a man well known in the labour world, who stood in very high estimation, said—

"General observation clearly indicates that employment in the United States is in fact inadequate and unstable; not only is now, in the present period of hard times from which American industry is suffering, but has been all along. No one can doubt it who realises the universal fear among American workingmen of losing a steady job."

Referring to the distress prevailing in the industrial centres, he added—

"You cannot see much of this from the windows of our Pullman cars, but you can learn it from the lips of those who live and work in and about these points of production. It is sadly true. But could it be true after nearly forty years of protection, if protection protected?"

He was speaking on this aspect of the question not because he wanted to score a point against the Opposition or any member of the Opposition, for if they could convince him that protection or tariff reform was a cure for unemployment, he would join them and go over to their side. He was so sincere on this question that he would willingly join any party which had a complete solution. He might be allowed to quote the official figures of the Labour Department of New York State, for he thought they were conclusive, though like our own statistics he admitted that they were imperfect for they referred only to skilled trades. In 1902 trade unions with a membership of 95,000 the average idleness for the first six months of the year was 34 per cent. Taking the first six months of any year since 1902, it would not be found that the figures were very promising. The average number of unemployed during the five years was 8·5 per cent. in March and 12·5 per cent. in June. This year the percentage was 37 in March and 30 in June. He knew what some hon. Members opposite might be inclined to say: "You are referring to the United States, and although it is a protected country, it is not on all fours with England."

MR. A. J. BALFOUR (City of London): I rise to a point of order, I do not like to interrupt the hon. Member, but this is really of vital importance. I understood that the hon. Gentleman was going to move a Resolution praising the Government for all they had done and for what they intended to do. As a matter of fact he has said nothing as yet except on the fiscal question. That is an aspect of the broad question of unemployment on which we feel very deeply on this side, but we certainly did not contemplate that it could come in any large measure within the scope of this debate, and I wish to ask how that in your opinion stands.

*MR. SPEAKER: I think the hon. Member is really anticipating an Amendment which will not be moved. He is really fighting the air in this matter, for he is discussing an Amendment which we shall never reach, and which cannot be reached, because it will be excluded by the first Amendment. I would suggest, therefore, that he should discard that portion of the subject until, if ever, it comes forward, and confine himself to the terms of his own Motion, and, if he pleases, to the terms of the Amendment which will be moved, and not to the terms of one which will not be moved.

*MR. ALDEN: Of course, I bow to your ruling, but my opportunity will be gone if such Amendments are moved later on. I was under the impression that this Amendment would be moved, and I was meeting the arguments in advance. I am glad to hear that those arguments are not to be used, and that we can have a plain and practical discussion.

*MR. SPEAKER: I ought perhaps to make it a little clearer. I understand that the Motion of the hon. Member relates to the steps which have been announced by the Prime Minister, and which are going to be taken immediately, leaving for future discussion what has been called the permanent solution of the difficulty. Well, it is obvious that no question of tariff reform can be an immediate solution of the difficulty because it would require legislation, and, therefore, so far as it relates to tariff reform there can be no Amendment to the Motion now before the House. To begin with, I doubt very much whether it is relevant, and in the second place it could not be moved after the first Amendment standing in the name of an hon. Member has been moved.

*MR. ALDEN said the matter was, of course, one of national importance and required to be discussed on broad lines. He bowed to the ruling and would proceed with his argument. The proposals of the Government were avowed anodynes and palliatives to meet the present difficulty. That would explain to some extent the position in which he found himself that day. Up to the present, as was well known, he and some of his friends had been in disagreement with the Government on this question, but they were promised—and this it was that had determined his position that day—"a real and effective blow at the permanent causes of unemployment." Whether these promises were destined to meet fulfilment or not, it was not for him to say, but he believed the pledge the Prime Minister had given was sincere and honest, and he thought it would be churlish not to recognise the courage of the Government in facing that stupendous task. Putting aside all these vexed questions as to what would be the permanent cure for the unemployment problem, might he deal with the first part of the Resolution with regard to the national importance of the problem? The Leader of the Opposition had asked a Question that day which seemed to him to be of great value, and to point in a direction, at any rate, in which it was important for them to move. The first thing they had to do was to get information. He did not mean by that that they had at present no information at all, but what they wanted was accurate information. He would suggest as one thing which the Government might do immediately that they should circularise all the districts where there was great distress or want of employment, and request the distress committees or, failing the distress committees, the local authorities to make a census by means of a house to house canvass of the districts to ascertain in that way the number of the unemployed, and to classify them when they had been enumerated. That had been done before in England with great effect. It was discovered that a large number of the unemployed did not register because they found that they failed to get work when they did so register. Many of them were skilled workmen who were receiving out-of-work pay, and they felt that they were to some extent demeaning themselves by putting their names on the labour registers. The actual number of unemployed was nearly double the number shown by the registers. The first thing to be done was to speed up the labour bureau and registry in order to get some accurate knowledge of the number of unemployed and to get them properly classified. Whether the Board of Trade or the Local Government Board should do that work was to him a matter of no moment. He would make no other suggestion to the Government, though he imagined it might be thought unnecessary, namely, that there should be a permanent and consultative committee, not sitting just at moments of emergency but always sitting, or always ready to sit to meet the difficulty of unemployment. He did not think it was possible for anyone to survey and investigate all the numerous schemes of work which were likely to be put forward in the near future. There were schemes of afforestation, land reclamation, foreign reclamation, the improvement of canals, and so on, and it seemed to him that these were matters for a committee of experts. The least they could do was to have committee of the Cabinet, the members which would deal with their own respective departments from the point of view of employment. He hoped the Government would see its way to appoint such a committee in order that the national importance of the question might be duly recognised and the national responsibility fairly faced. He thought it would appear to every Member of the House that this was a question which could not be solved locally. He had never heard anyone say that this was merely a local question, and yet they were somehow or other unable to face the question nationally owing to lack of machinery and organisation. Public opinion was still in favour of the present social and industrial arrangements. Public opinion still strongly supported the competitive system. That being so, he said it was the duty of the community to endeavour to meet the difficulties which were inherent in the system. The community could do that in three different ways. First, there was organisation, for without better organisation than they had at present the solution of the unemployment problem was impossible. Then they needed to encourage the local authorities. The President of the Local Government Board must encourage them to do their duty and to play their part. If they were to carry out that duty cheerfully and successfully they must be met in a very frank and generous spirit. At the present time when there were hundreds of thousands of men out of work, and when there were many hundreds of thousands of women and children dependent upon these men, he thought it was necessary for the Government to be open-handed in dealing with this matter. He would suggest that whatever subventions were going to be granted should be granted as speedily as possible, so that local authorities might know what amount of money they might have to reckon with and what it would be possible for them to do in the future. And, finally, they could offer an alternative of work. He was not at all in agreement with those who thought that it was impossible for the State to find useful work. He thought he could mention half a dozen men in the House who, if they sat in council for only half an hour, could suggest schemes of work which would meet with the approval of the House, and which could be usefully carried out so as to afford employment to 100,000 men. Why was it not possible for those schemes to be carried out at the present juncture? Because nearly all those schemes of work depended upon getting hold of the land. What he meant was that nearly all the land—waste and derelict land, which they would wish to use for special purposes—was land that could not be obtained without buying it from private owners. He did not wish to say that many private owners were not willing to sell their land, but that would mean a long period of negotiation and the while those negotiations were proceeding people were starving. Therefore they must look to the Government to find ways and means for obtaining that land in the future. That proposal, however, must be reserved for next session. As to the present emergency, he had already spoken of the helplessness of the distressed districts to face the problem. He would give a few reasons for that statement. Nearly all the distressed localities which had a large number of unemployed were the most highly rated. Take his own district, Tottenham. The rates there amounted to 10s. 7d. in the £. and they had recently gone up 6d. It was the same with West Ham, Walthamstow, East Ham, and other districts. If they went to the North of England the case was very little better. The fact of the matter was that those highly rated boroughs and districts could not afford to help the unemployed. They had a larger number of poor than other districts; they had the children of the poor to educate, which was a very costly business; and they had a large number of unemployed. He was sure that these poverty-stricken districts deserved the sympathy of the House. The men who lived in them and the labourers who worked in them were not the men who created wealth for the district, but for London. One could see hordes of these men pouring into trains in order to come to London to work. Tottenham, Edmorton, West and East Ham, Walthamstow were nothing but the dormitories of London. That being so either London or the Government should give some assistance. He would prefer that the Government should give it, for, after all, London had its own problem of unemployment; it had 17,000 on its labour registries to-day, and these men had to be assisted. Let him say that he was at one with the position which the Government had taken up in regard to the 1d. rate. It was useless to ask Tottenham or West Ham to employ the men out of work and pay them a fair rate of wages out of a 1d. rate, even if they could afford to put an additional 1d. on the existing high rate. Although a 1d. rate would be of some value to other towns and districts it was of no value to those highly rated towns which had large numbers of unemployed. It seemed clear that they must have schemes of work submitted to them by the Government if ever they were to deal with the total distress to be found elsewhere than in London, and he believed that the Government were prepared to consider such schemes. He would do his best and he was sure that hon. Gentlemen opposite would do their best to back up the Government in carrying out such schemes. He would urge the Prime Minister and the President of the Local Government Board not to wait for the Report of the Poor Law Commission. Those who knew what was going on in the Poor Law Commission were perfectly well aware that there could be no unanimous Report. Not only that; there would be no Majority Report that could be considered. [OPPOSITION cries of "Oh!"] It was fairly well-known that the Majority Report would advise that the unemployed should be handed over to the tender mercies of an extended Poor Law. [OPPOSITION cries of "How do you know?"] He only said that the general impression had got abroad—of course he did not bind down himself to it—that the majority of the Poor Law Commission, led by the Secretary of the Charity Organisation Society, would make that recommendation. But whether that was so or not, it was useless to wait for the Report of the Poor Law Commission, because it would not be anything like unanimous. [OPPOSITION cries of "What do you know about it?"] He spoke from some knowledge of the subject, and therefore it would be advisable to take any action that was deemed necessary before that Commission had reported. The Prime Minister in his speech had said that he would endeavour to impart more elasticity to this work of helping the local authorities to assist the unemployed. He trusted that this would be the case. He had just one suggestion to make in regard to the Unemployed Act of 1905. He thought the right hon. Member for South Dublin would agree that it would be desirable to accept the suggestion which he made, and he believed that it was possible. Section 2 of that Act said—

"This provision shall extend to any municipal borough or urban district with a population according to the last Census for the time being of less than 50,000 but not less than 10,000, if the council of the borough or district make an application for the purpose to the Local Government Board, and the Board consent."

All he asked was that the Government should, as far as possible, allow the borough or district councils with a comparatively small population—approximating 10,000 rather than 50,000—to appoint distress committees. That would improve the machinery working at the present time and make it much more possible for the unemployed in many of those smaller districts to obtain relief. He saw an Amendment down on the Paper which seemed to imply that the measures of the Government were uneconomic in their character. He believed that the hon. Member for Preston had stated that these proposals were merely to provide preferential employment for the unfit. He wished the hon. Member would go down to Preston and say that at a meeting of the unemployed. If that were accepted in his constituency the answer to the hon. Member was that the unemployed in Preston must be a very bad lot. He had had experience of the unemployed in many cities, and it was entirely opposed to that of the hon. Gentleman. He might be allowed to quote some figures as to a census of the unemployed made in West Ham by the Charity Organisation Society by their own investigators in order to check that made officially by the West Ham authorities, to test whether the registered unemployed were genuine or not. The unemployed were divided into four classes. Of the 4,194 men on the register 49, or 1·2 cent., were regular artisans; 648, 5.5 per cent., were casual artisans; 1,662, or 39.6 per cent., were casual labourers; 825, 19.6 per cent., were men who did work, could not or would not work; 1,010, or 24.1 per cent., were unemployed. Class 4 was sub-divided into three sections. Those who were past work, 293, or 7.0 per cent.; those who were prevented from working by illness, 157, or 3.7 per cent.; and of the whole 4,194 those who would not work through drink or indolence were 375, 8.9 per cent. He contended that these figures proved that the unemployed problem was a real problem and not a problem of the unfit or inefficient. If he had misunderstood the hon. Member for Preston he apologised; but he did understand him to say that the Government proposal was one to give preferential employment to the unfit.

MR. HAROLD COX (Preston): What was said was that the unfit would get a reference.

*MR. ALDEN said that he would give the hon. Member more evidence. He had had a talk with the manager of the works at Tottenham who took on men only of a very high standard. He asked his question: "Are these men who apply to you for work genuine unemployed; do they really want work?" And his answer was: "I could get 1,000 men in two or three days time quite up to my standard." He was quite sure that many hon. Members would agree from their own experience that that was the case. The hon. Member for Preston was extremely kind-hearted, a humane man, an extremely honest man. If he were not an honest man his constituents would not allow him so much latitude as they did. But he was obsessed by the fear of an economic law. He commended to the hon. Member the words of Professor Marshall, of Cambridge—

"The doctrine of the economic man has become an engine for keeping the working classes in their place."

It was really time that they remembered that economic laws were modified by considerations of humanity, and that gradually they would be so shaped and modified that in times like the present the problem of unemployment could be dealt with without any questions at all. Why was it uneconomic to assist the unemployed by starting relief works? He agreed with the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board that relief works were an evil, but they were a necessary evil at the present time. If he were asked whether he considered the help given by the Poor Law or that given by relief works was the more economic, he would certainly say that the former was not the system which would recommend itself to the economist as against the relief given by relief works, properly supervised. Last year Tottenham engaged 1,827 unemployed. The estimated cost of the work was £6,046, and the cost at which it was actually carried out was £5,705. There might be all sorts of explanations for that. It might be that the engineer's estimates were too high, but the fact remained that the work was carried out under proper supervision, and the men who were engaged upon it were carefully chosen. Relief works, properly carried out and properly supervised, need not be disastrous from the economic point of view. They were infinitely to be preferred to the relief afforded by the Poor Law as at present administered. It was pointed out by a Member of the present Poor Law Commission some years ago that the relief given by relief works was the same in its nature as that given by the Poor Law, though the recipient in taking it thought that he was not a pauper. But that was an important psychological distinction. It was absolutely necessary that a man should not think he was a pauper in accepting this relief. If he did he was degraded in his own estimation, and went rapidly down the scale. They wanted the man in receipt of relief works to feel that he was giving something in return. He was persuaded that it was the one expedient left for the immediate emergency and that under proper supervision and ordinary care relief works were not the great evil they were represented to be. He believed in the sincerity of the pledge that the Prime Minister had given. He believed the right hon. Gentleman was sincere when he gave that pledge. He should await the future action of the Government, and so long as the Government acted up to its promises and its pledges they were sure not only of his support, but also of the support of many who sat near him. He begged to move.

*MR. J. M. ROBERTSON (Northumberland, Tyneside), in seconding the Motion said his hon. friends on the Labour benches had put down an Amendment which was apparently one of condemnation, but his hon. friends would agree with him that the policy now under discussion represented an immense advance in political thought in one generation. The mover of the Motion had spoken of the great development during the last twelve months. As to that he was not quite clear, but those who remembered the utterances of Liberal statesmen a generation ago must have noticed a very great change. It was then said by a Liberal statesman that no Government could undertake to deal with such a trouble as unemployment, because "Man is born to trouble as the sparks fly upward." But there was not a Conservative now in the House, with the possible exception of the hon. Member for Preston, the champion of partially obsolete causes, who would maintain the general proposition that it was no part of the duty of a Government to face the evils of unemployment. It was true that the interest shown by the Opposition, in relation to this Motion, was due to other considerations; nevertheless he was glad to see that the Opposition, as a body, took an interest in the question of unemployment, though that interest might be somewhat factitious. It was at least a historical fact that during ten years of office hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite had not made a single effort to deal systematically with this question. But it was all the more creditable to hon. Members opposite that they should show a real concern to lessen as much as possible the evil of unemployment in the first of the two bad winters in which it was prophesied there would be great unemployment. It was, however, remarkable that when the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham sought re-election in 1900 he claimed re-election on the score of years of unexampled prosperity which he represented to be the result of his party's policy. In 1900 there was certainly no recognition upon the Opposition side of unemployment as a standing evil. On the Radical side, on the other hand, there had always been a doctrine of intervention. More than a generation ago John Stuart Mill declared that of all distressed persons, men out of employment through no fault of their own, had the best kind of claim to the earnest and kindly consideration of any Government, and he pointed out that inasmuch as the criminal poor had to be provided for while under detention, to leave the honest poor out of employment, unprovided for, was simply to put a premium on crime. But John Stuart Mill had no constructive policy. The difficulty was how to grapple with this problem, even with temporary and palliative measures. He was not sure that the Prime Minister was not too modest when he called his proposals mere palliatives. Palliatives which relieved the distress of many thousands were important measures. He was glad to second this Motion, because he considered the policy pursued was an honest attempt to grapple with the evil, and was on the whole the best line of policy to follow. Of all methods of providing work for unemployed in circumstances of this kind the extension of employment by the action of local authorities and others in promoting works of construction was the soundest. He did not allege that it would cover the whole field of unemployment. He would simply say, in justification of the policy of the Local Government Board, that it was the right course to strive to the utmost to set all local authorities to work to employ labour on considerable works, and to leave relief works as a last resource. While he agreed that relief works were better than Poor Law relief, still they were not much better, and they had this drawback, that if the relief works turned out to be the farce that they often had in recent years there was an element of demoralisation set up which almost equalled the demoralisation and the deterioration which became apparent when people were in receipt of Poor Law relief. It was said by the opponents to this Motion that the proper y of dealing with this question would to set up a Government Department.

remembered on a former occasion the hon. Member for West Ham saying—

In the name of all that is sane in Socialism we do not seek to set up Government industries for the unemployed."

The hon. Member then received, he was glad to see, the assent of all hon. members on the Labour benches, and that fact should be kept in mind to-day. He associated himself with the hon. mover of the Motion. Their support of the Government's policy in this matter turned on the promise of the Government that these measures of temporary alleviation and betterment would be followed by a systematic policy to which the country could look to stop a recurrence of this evil. He would not attempt to forecast that policy, but would simply say that to be successful it must involve and force the utilisation of the land. That was fundamental. It was finally a matter of the promotion of production. But beyond that he thought, even in regard to the present measure, it might be possible to borrow certain methods, of which they had certain examples elsewhere, to deal with unemployment generally. When in Germany, in the year 1879, the Imperial Government resorted to a policy of tariffs, one of the first effects was to create an enormous amount of unemployment involving the existence of 400,000 idle men travelling the roads of Germany seeking work. It was that fact which in Germany led to the creation of a number of institutions to grapple with this problem. He did not praise all these institutions, but some of them contained things it would be well to copy. Whilst it was true that in some German towns three men might be seen seeking for one vacant post, on the land there were more openings than men seeking work. That was a great relief to unemployment in Germany, and that was a matter in which a lesson might be learned from the German system. With regard to the theoretical right of a man to work, he did not see how a right could be said to vest in an individual to demand of society something which society was not organised to provide. He thought that form of appeal was the more to be deprecated, because there was a more persuasive appeal, which was that it was in the interest of society to organise in every way to prevent unemployment. Unemployment tended to impoverish the State, and therefore it was the business of the State to seek to guard systematically against unemployment. If the wealth of the country fell off it was the business of the Government to face that question and seek to remove the evil. When his hon. friend, in moving the Motion, said something about economic laws which would have to be modified, he inwardly dissented from the hon. Gentleman, because he could not see how an economic law could be modified. If an economic proposition required to be modified, then it had not really stated an economic law. It was to the interest of the State to insure the maximum of production, and it was because this policy would tend to promote the maximisation of production that he was with his hon. friend. He would be sorry to see this matter put upon an economic basis alone, because there was also a moral basis to be considered. All social progress presented itself, morally, in the form of extension of sympathy, and materially in the form of extension of co-operation. It was because the policy under discussion implied and promoted, and in some measure achieved these things that he was glad to second his hon. friend's Motion.

Motion made and Question proposed, "That this House welcomes the statement of the Prime Minister with regard to the national importance of the problem of unemployment, and approves of the steps proposed to be taken by the Government to meet the present emergency."—(Mr. Alden.)

*MR. KEIR HARDIE (Merthyr Tydvil) moved the following Amendment—"That whilst recognising the importance of the promise of the Prime Minister to introduce legislation next session for dealing with unemployment on a permanent basis, and whilst welcoming the promise to administer with more elasticity the existing Act and to provide more money to make that possible, this House is of opinion that the proposals made are quite inadequate to meet the pressing needs of the unemployed this winter, and that the responsibility for the absence of proper machinery even for carrying out existing powers, and the general unpreparedness of the country to meet the present unemployed crisis is due to the neglect of the Government to make provision for a state of affairs which was clearly foreseen." He said the most extraordinary feature of the speeches to which they had just listened from the hon. Members who moved and seconded the Motion was the very careful way in which they had steered clear of the Government proposals. The hon. Member for Tottenham had, he knew, done a very great deal of self-sacrificing work in the cause of the unemployed, but he had never undertaken any work which had so excited his (Mr. Keir Hardie's) sympathy as the task which he had just performed. The hon. Member for Tyneside had embarked on a very abstruse discussion on the sanctity of economic law. There was no such thing as economic law outside the four corners of the multiplication table. Certain propositions were laid down by economists, and certain deductions drawn from them. That was all the political economists had ever done. Two and two made four. When they had said that, they had exhausted economic law. The hon. Member further said that the right to work was not a right which the State would recognise, but the State never did recognise a right, political or civil, unless it had been forced upon it by opinion outside. The franchise was a case in point. When the right to live was assumed together with the right to be protected by the State the right to work must be deduced from that. He should have thought the right to be employed was no longer denied, except by such antediluvian political economists as the hon. Member for Preston. They were not there to consider the abstract proposition of the right to work. The only question before the House was whether the Government proposal was adequate to meet the emergency in which they now found themselves. He hoped that nothing was going to be done that would give the discussion a party bias. The mover of the Motion steered clear of that fatal point, but he was afraid the seconder did not follow his example. He had alleged that the Party on the Opposition benches had been in power for ten years without doing anything.

*MR. J. M. ROBERTSON: I said systematically.

*MR. KEIR HARDIE said the only Act passed by any Government dealing systematically with unemployment since the days of Queen Elizabeth was the Act of 1905 introduced by the right hon. Member for South Dublin. It was a curious fact that the only power the Government had at their disposal of distributing the proposed money grant was the power given under that Act. Emigration was no longer available as a remedy for unemployment. As the result of emigration they had, as the hon. Member for the Tottenham division had said, large numbers of unemployed in Canada and elsewhere. In the city of Toronto alone 10,000 heads of families this winter were receiving relief owing to unemployment. Those figures were obtained from Mr. McLeod, the Chairman of the Relief Committee. The policy of dumping down our out-of-works in the Colonies had strained the loyalty of large numbers of workpeople in those Colonies. The very name of Englishman was being held in disrespect in Canada owing to the quality of emigrants now sent out under the distress committees for unemployment. The real point before the House was the adequacy of the statement of the Prime Minister to meet the emergency which the right hon. Gentleman had told them the other day was neither unanticipated nor unprovided for, and yet, strangely enough, this crisis which was foreseen and which they were told was provided for did not seem to have led the Government even to take elementary steps to find out the extent of the problem with which they had to deal. It was said that the Government had no figures to assist them in dealing with this matter. In times past chunks of figures had been thrown to the House with regard to exports and imports as proving the prosperity of this country. If anything of the kind was attempted that afternoon he would forewarn the House that such figures were no longer to be taken as a reliable index to the state of the labour market. They could, consistently with an increase of import and export trade, have an actual crease in numbers employed. Constantly improving machinery and the better organisation of industry made it possible for the output to be increased, and the number of men and women employed to be actually decreased. He had attempted to make the best estimate he could with the means at his disposal as to the extent of the evil. In August last, when the House was about to be adjourned without having done anything to meet the coming winter, the Right to Work Council, of which he happened to be a member, issued a circular letter to the trade unions and other kindred bodies seeking information as to the extent of unemployment. They had now got returns from the trade councils and the chief officials of trade unions. The Board of Trade Labour Gazette gave the number out of work in certain trade unions as 9·4 per cent. Might he once more remind the House that this figure represented the number of members of trade unions who were at that moment receiving out-of-work pay. Every trade union did not pay out-of-work allowance, and those who did so only paid for a limited period, at the end of which a member ceased to draw his pay, and no longer appeared in the Board of Trade Returns. Therefore, 9·4 per cent., serious as the figure was, did not necessarily represent the full extent of the evil. The figures he had were for September, and were as follows: Trade unions showing less than 5 per cent. of unemployed, 49; over 5 per cent., and under 10 per cent., 33; over 10 per cent., and under 20 per cent., 26; over 20 per cent., and under 40 per cent., 12; over 40 per cent., and under 50 per cent., 13. He had a list of unions which were not connected with either the shipbuilding industry, the building trade, or the engineering trade, all showing large percentages of unemployed ranging from 45 per cent. in connection with the United Society of Smiths and Hammermen down to 10 per cent. in connection with the Amalgamated Society of Brush-makers. Taking the figures altogether, and assuming, on the most conservative estimate that could be made, that only 15 per cent. of the skilled artisans were out of work—and let it be remembered that in the shipbuilding industries the percentage was 25—they had the very conservative estimate of 750,000 skilled artisans out of employment in September, many of whom had been unemployed for twelve, fifteen, eighteen months, or two years. If they came to unskilled labour, he was sure that there was no Member of that House or person out of it that knew anything about employment, who would dispute his statement that the number of unskilled people out of work could always be safely set down at double the number of unemployed skilled artisans. If that were so, the number of unskilled workers unemployed was 1,500,000, making a total of skilled and unskilled of 2,250,000 unemployed. If they allowed that each of these men represented in addition to himself two dependents—again a very moderate estimate—they got the appalling total of 6,750,000 as the number of persons whose case was being considered by the House that afternoon. He submitted that whatever opinions they held about Socialism, tariff reform, land reform, or any other question of the like kind, this was a human problem which must be faced and solved. They could not allow this enormous mass of men, women and children to face this winter without some kind of adequate provision being made for them. His estimate about skilled and unskilled labour had been borne out by the experience of the distress committees. The President of the Local Government Board, speaking on 29th July of this year, and reported in the next morning's Times, said that ninety-eight distress committees were at work, and with these 90,000 men and 3,000 women had been registered; 54,000 were qualified, of whom 37,000 received work. The young and the strong were affected. Of those between twenty and thirty years of age, there were 80 per cent.; and between thirty and forty years of age, 25 per cent. Of those registered, 70 per cent. were labourers or builders, leaving 30 per cent. skilled artisans. These figures were for the year 1907, and the skilled artisans who applied to the distress committees had reached a very low ebb indeed. And if skilled artisans to the extent of 30 per cent. applied in 1907 for employment, then God only knew how these people were living at this period of 1908.

Now he came to the Government proposals. First, with regard to the penny rate, the Prime Minister, who he was sorry to see was not at present in his place, appeared to be under a misapprehension. The suggestion made from the Labour benches to the right hon. Gentleman and to the Government was not that the local authorities should be authorised or empowered to raise an extra penny rate to deal with unemployment. Under the Unemployed Workmen Act of 1905 the distress committees had power to spend with the sanction of the Local Government Board up to the extent of a penny rate. They might spend that rate for certain purposes. They might not spend it upon wages, and the suggestion from the Labour benches was that the embargo which prevented their spending that money for wages should be removed. That was the only suggestion. The Prime Minister spoke lightly of the sum likely to be raised by a penny rate, yet he admitted that it would amount in the distress areas to £370,000, or £70,000 more than the Government proposed to spend. Comparatively, therefore, it could not be called a small sum. There were some ways in which the distress committees could assist the unemployed which would not be possible to a local authority, and the proposal from the Labour benches was that the distress committees should have their hands free to grapple with the problem during this winter. Might he say generally with regard to the local authorities that there was nothing new in the proposal which had been made by the Government; it was as old as the days when the right hon. Gentleman, who was now President of the Local Government Board, was carrying the red flag of the unemployed in Trafalgar Square. In that very year the President of the Board of Trade issued a circular to the local authorities calling upon them to expedite and antedate any work they had in hand; and that policy had been pursued regularly every distress year since. To put this forward, then, as something special to meet the crisis now upon them was misleading

the House and the public outside. There was nothing special about it. In his speech on Saturday the right hon. Gentleman had given as the true reason why local works had not been proceeded with, that for a number of years after the Boer War the money market was tight, the rate of interest was high, and the municipal authorities did not undertake works which could be delayed. As the President of the Local Government Board said, money was now cheaper, and the local authorities were trying to make up arrears of work, yet in face of this it was alleged that this proposal of the Local Government Board was a special means to meet the distress with which they were now face to face. Then they came to the other step taken by the Government, that of enlisting now instead of later on 24,000 men of the Special Reserve. The remarkable fact, which appealed strongly to some of them, was that the Government thought that £300,000 was enough to meet the requirements of 6,500,000 of decent people. [MINISTERIAL cries of "No."] Yes; that was the position. ["No."] Hon. Members might say "No," but he had listened to the mover and seconder of the Resolution to hear what else the Government had proposed, and the only proposition was a £300,000 special grant to meet the needs of the unemployed.

MR. ALDEN: I said that the pledge of the Government was that this amount should be supplemented.

*MR. KEIR HARDIE: That may be so, but the Prime Minister's pledges have been broken before in regard to this matter. Continuing, the hon. Member said he was not now speaking in the region of prophecy; he was addressing himself to what was before the House namely, the promise of £300,000 for nearly 7,000,000 of decent people. It was the old old story. If money was wanted for preparations for war it could be found in abundance. It was only where it was wanted to preserve human life that there was stinginess in the way it was doled out. He should have thought the Government would be above using a crisis like the present as a means of completing a scheme of their own creation. Now he came to the Post Office, most fraudulent part of the scheme. The country was told that 8,000 men were to be employed, and now they learnt that it was done every year. He learned, too, that the bulk of the men were only employed for two weeks. That morning he had a call from a man who was out of work.

He informed him that he was a supporter of the Conservative Party, and had some time about coming to him, but he showed him the reply he had had to his application to be taken on at Christmas a few days after the statement of the Prime Minister. This was how it read—
“It was on a printed form; evidently the authorities at the Post Office were prepared for what was going to follow the Prime Minister’s speech—

“With reference to your application for temporary employment at the Post Office in the coming Christmas season, I regret to have to inform you that no such employment can be given you here as all the men required at this office have already been obtained.”

Now came the central fund. In the first place, they had no guarantee that the money would be spent. There had been grants of £200,000 in the past two years, and in neither year had the money been spent. It was most significant that they were informed that afternoon that the money was only to be voted to distress committees. There were large areas of the country in which there were no distress committees, but in which there was much distress. In South Wales one miners’ union had already exhausted its funds in giving relief to its members, and the whole Welsh coalfield was to be levied to provide a further relief fund. But there was no distress committee. Was the old niggardly cheese-paring policy which had brought such discredit upon the Local Government Board during the last two years to be continued in the spending of this money? If so, the grant was meant more for mere window-dressing than for practical purposes. The difference in cost between work done under distress committees compared with ordinary contractors was to be made good. But what about skilled artisans? Were they to receive no recognition from the Government at such a period? Was the man who made some provision against unemployment through his trade union to be shut off from sharing in the fund? That appeared to be the policy as laid down at present. Perhaps the hardest case of all was that of unemployed women. Workshops and other means of assisting women were limited and restricted on every hand. Was nothing more to be done to relieve them? And what about provision of meals for hungry school children? There were agencies all over the country, both public and private, for the provision of food to such children at school and at home; could not part of this money be given to assist these funds to make more adequate provision for this purpose? If it was left to the Local Government Board to distribute the money, he had the greatest fear of what would happen during the coming winter. He would strongly press upon the Government the advisability of not leaving this grant to be distributed by the Local Government Board, but to give them either a special Committee of the Cabinet or of the Whole House to supervise distribution. If it was left to the Local Government Board every application would be viewed in the narrowest possible light, and would be subjected to the narrow scrutiny which the law imposed upon the ordinary Local Government Board work. But if it was given to a Committee, the human claims of the case would be considered rather than the strict legal interpretation of the application. He strongly urged that this course should be taken. An extra grant of £100,000 was to be made this winter, which would make in all £300,000, representing 3½d. a head of the number of people requiring relief. He asked that the Government should take further and more adequate steps to deal with the situation. The local authorities were being urged to speed on their work; why did not the Government set an example in other Departments than the Admiralty? Had the Commissioners of Woods and Forests no land that could be turned to account? Had the First Commissioner of Works no public buildings or improvements to put in hand? The responsibility for the country finding itself in its present unpreparedness rested entirely and exclusively with the Cabinet. Everybody except the President of the Local Government Board knew that the crisis was upon them. On five separate occasions the Labour Party had brought the subject before the House this session. Those of them who had brought the question forward had been stigmatised as panic-mongers, political mischief-makers, Jeremiahs, exploiting the unemployed for party interests. Hon. Members cheered. Let them assume that those taunts were true. That did not justify the Government in not having taken measures. The Unemployed Act Amendment Bill brought forward by the Labour Party had been denounced, misrepresented, and lied about by members of the Government, especially when seeking re-election. The proposal that that Bill contained was that there should be placed upon the nation as a whole, locally and nationally, the obligation to find work for those out of employment, or, failing work, food. The Prime Minister eulogised the President of the Local Government Board the other day. It was essentially one of those occasions where to excuse is to accuse. If the work of the Department was not its own justification their eulogies would only accentuate the failure. Each time they pressed this matter upon the attention of the Government they were told that they had to wait for the Report of the Poor Law Commission, which was to have appeared in September or October, and which had now been postponed till March. They could not wait for any Report of any Poor Law Commission. This question of unemployment had been shelved from year to year, and from Government to Government, with the one solitary exception to which he had referred, and even that Act, under the present Government, had been narrowed down to its utmost limits. Part of the Hollesley Bay scheme was to acquire a second estate to which men could be drafted after their sixteen weeks training in the colony itself. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of Dublin, during his tenure of office, sanctioned the idea of the second estate being acquired, but when the present President of the Local Government Board came into office he put his foot down and prevented that scheme being carried out. They felt strongly on this subject, and if they said strong things about the Local Government Board, it was not because of any personal bias—[MINISTERIAL cries of "Oh, oh!"]—but because they felt keenly that a Department, specially charged with the responsibility of dealing with the question, was the old man of the sea about the neck of the Government in this very matter, and they could not afford to sit quiet and allow that state of things to continue. They asked for some declaration from the Government of a further extension of their proposals. He would say, as he had said before, years ago, that if these people were to be placed outside the law they had no right to expect them to obey the law, and if the worse came to the worst he should not content himself with speaking from the sanctuary of a seat in Parliament, but would go amongst his own people who were suffering from hunger and cold, and he would take the responsibility, and the consequences, for the advice he would give them. The country was in earnest in this matter, and he wanted the Government to reflect the feeling of the country by doing something adequate to remove the scandal and the reproach of men, women, and innocent children dying of hunger in the capital of the Empire, the richest city on the face of the earth. He begged to move.

MR. CROOKS (Woolwich) said they had always been placed in a difficult position by an Amendment of this character, because it invariably took a personal turn. He had always tried to point out that this was not a personal but a national matter. For the twentieth time certain statements had been made, certain bogeys stuck up, for the purpose of being knocked down again, but they had no real existence, although they were good enough for a fight. He complimented the Prime Minister upon his statement, but he sympathised with him because he had been obliged to trot out a stage array of figures from the Local Government Board. He had heard those figures until he was tired of them, and there was nothing in them. Every President of the Local Government Board—and he remembered eight or nine—got out the same kind of figures, and they amounted to this, that: "You had only got to pawn your shirt nd live on it." That was the effect of the statement, and those who wished to persuade them that that was dealing with the unemployed did not appreciate the fact that the Elementary Education Act was passed in 1870. They were told that they must be very careful what they did for the unemployed, because all the time they were sapping the backbone of the working-men who had been the safeguard of the British nation. Something had been said about the thrifty working-man on Saturday, but he was like the suffering ratepayer, for they could always hang a story on him. Who had created the thriftless working-men? The continued neglect of the Government. They talked about the working-men making no provision when they were in work for those bad times which must inevitably come. Out of what? Out of wages? There was a class of men in the docks who held a B ticket. They knew what the hon. Member for West Ham would say about the man with a B ticket. He knew of the case of a man with a B ticket who had been waiting at the docks for eight weeks, and he had not got an hour's work. Fancy reading that man a homily upon thrift. Their system created the worthless men. Many of the people to whom this sort of thrift had been preached were teetotallers and trade unionists, and even then had had to walk about on the uppers of their boots. That was wicked, to say the least of it. Nothing took the manhood out of the nation like compulsory rest. The Government ought not to interfere with the manly independence of the nation, and find in it an excuse for doing nothing. The Prime Minister had trotted out a list of figures of the loans granted to the various local authorities, but he was getting a little tired of those figures, because he had seen them in season and out of season. What had they always asked for? That in times of plenty some provision should be made for times of scarcity, want, and distress. Why had the Government not done this? The Prime Minister would be a little bit surprised to know that the concession he made on Wednesday had added considerably to their burdens and trouble in London. The Government had promised to give £300,000 where they had given £200,000 before.

Even when the grant was £200,000 they did not spend it all, and yet men were starving in the streets, and women were praying and beseeching for a loaf of bread for their little children. He had seen the children clinging to their mothers' skirts, and he had heard them saying: "Come home, mammy; I am so hungry." They knew how the Local Government Board had told them that it was no part of its duty to adjust social inequalities. What was the House of Commons created for? To adjust social inequalities. There was no critic in the world equal to that of the Local Government Board, for all that it did was to condemn everything placed before it. When Parliament granted money the Local Government Board paid it back again into the Exchequer account. The Local Government Board had made some wonderful suggestions during the last month or two for doing what he had been condemned for doing. They had been giving able-bodied men relief under the Poor Law and paying 5s. 9d. a week to a family of four people. Now an Order had been issued to stop that relief, and they were putting the Modified Workhouse Test Order, passed in 1849, into force. What about this wonderful Order which was going to deal with the unemployed? It provided that if an able-bodied man applied for relief he might be sent into the workhouse, and have his wife and family relieved outside. The result of that Order was that they shut the man up in the workhouse, and he was doing absolutely nothing at all. That man would cost between 10s. and 12s. a week to maintain in the workhouse, and they would be giving what was called adequate outdoor relief to his family costing between 12s. and 14s. a week, so that the people who were satisfied before with 5s. 9d. per week would cost the ratepayers 25s. per week. He did not know whether there was any more glorious initiative left in the Local Government Board permanent official staff after that. Nearly 300 of these men were shut up, and he supposed that he should have given evidence against them, but he did not. They were looking at one another, doing nothing, but thinking and worrying about their wives and children all the time. Bad men did not care whether they were sent to the workhouse or not, but good men did, and it was to try to preserve them if possible that these orders had been suspended. Despite the condition of things at present with respect to unemployment, this Government, like the Governments that had gone before, said: "We cannot do anything." What was proposed was like drawing money out of the bank to build a house before the plans were ready. It was not money they wanted at this moment, but an organised system which would put the unemployed to work. It was the absence of that system of which they complained bitterly, as they had done in bygone days. It was no excuse to say that that complaint had not been brought forward. It had been constantly brought forward, and the answer had been always the same. There was one scheme under which a sum of £40,000 was raised and yet not one ha'porth of work could be found. The whole of London was up in arms in regard to that scheme. They were asked: "What are you doing? Why don't you spend some of that money?" They had to wait until 1st January, 1905, before they could do anything. He remembered that they appealed to the then Prime Minister in the name of twenty town councils, fifty-six unions, and four rural districts, and requested him to call Parliament together at the end of 1904 to discuss this question. They got the same stereotyped answer which they always got. In the case of the women they were told that to find employment meant subsidising drunken husbands, but the actual facts did not bear out that contention. It was time to get away from shuffling with figures in order that they might do something worth doing. What were they doing? They had passed a Small Holdings Act to keep men on the land, but every obstacle was placed in its way. The noble Lord at the head of the Board of Agriculture would go to tremendous lengths to see the whole of the Act put in proper operation. Then why was it not done? Whose fault was it that they left the poor man who wanted a bit of land at the mercy of some local magnate who would frown him out of the place if he so much as asked? What he desired was that the money set aside for small holdings should be spent. Why were not information bureaux set up so that men, without going to their landlord, or their representative on the county council, could learn exactly what to do to secure the land? No. The Government were going to give them £300,000 to keep them quiet. Meanwhile people were starving, and if the Prime Minister had offered them £1,000,000 last week they would be no better off. "The time has arrived for a great scheme," they were told in 1892. He supposed the scheme would come along presently. They had Town Planning Bills which were to do much. The House forgot that four-fifths of the population were housed on 600,000 acres, while the total acreage was something like 77,000,000. There was plenty of room for the people, and if they had a statesman to tackle the land question there would be no unemployed. They were told they were pandering to loafers. Perhaps so, but they were mostly rich loafers. And in the administration of the Unemployed Act they had taken the bottom man and, because he was not up to sample, had declared the lot bad. There were three classes to deal with—the man who was willing to work, the man who was unwilling, and the man who was unable—and they could be dealt with easily with proper organisation. If the Government had asked town councils, and borough engineers and surveyors the question: "What would you do in times of commercial depression if you had money, quite apart from those works of utility for which you get loans from time to time from the Local Government Board?" they would have had schemes pigeon-holed on which the unemployed could have been set to work as easily as possible. They were told that some wonderful schemes were being thought out by the Local Government Board, but what they were nobody knew, and he was almost going to say nobody cared. The question was: What are the Government going to do at this moment? It was no part of his duty to suggest. [MINISTERIAL cries of "Oh!"] He was only following the example set by right hon. Gentlemen opposite, who, when they were asked during the time of the late Government what they would suggest, relied that it was not their duty to suggest what should be done; it would be time enough to do so when called in by the nation. He did not expect to be called in by the nation, and he did not want to be. The right hon. Gentleman said years ago that the suggesting was to be done by the people who were paid to do it. But he would repeat his suggestion that foreshore reclamation would take all the rough men they could find. A good deal of labour could be absorbed in dealing with coast erosion, waste or derelict land reclamation, in afforestation, in developing the Small Holdings Act, and in making it work—not by adopting the penny-in-the-slot system and saying: "Some day you will get a bit of land," and in pushing through the Town Planning Bill. The fact of the matter was that there was frequently a waste of energy in praying for something to come along. They would not get anything by praying for it. [Cries of "Oh!"] They had got to go out and fetch it. He remembered an old mate who used to say to his wife: "Trust in Providence," and she replied: "Not me, old man; He has done me too many times already." The Government were paid to look for schemes to find work for the unemployed. They had got full plenty of money; there was ground enough to provide work for every man and woman in the country. If, in the interest of party tactics, they went on as they did for another year and another year, these unemployed men would become so degraded and sink so low, that nothing would lift them up again. Look at 400 human beings creeping into a night shelter for a basin of cocoa and a bit of bread, and crawling out in the morning incapable of doing a day's work if it were given to them. What put them there? Was it because Nature could not supply them with food, clothing, and shelter? Nature supplied these full and to spare, and why they did not get them was because there were no administrators. He repeated that a man who was willing to work should be kept up to his capacity to work and found work. A man unwilling to work should be made to work. [Cries of "How?"] By keeping him without food for a time he would work all right. A man unable to work should be taken and given hospital treatment until he was able to work and take care of himself. There was food full and plenty for all. As John Davidson said—

"More than would for all suffice

Earth from her full bosom pours,

Yet in cities, wolfish eyes

Haunt the windows and the doors."

Amendment proposed—

"In line 1, to leave out from the word 'That,' to the end of the Question, and add the words 'whilst recognising the importance of the promise of the Prime Minister to introduce legislation next session for dealing with unemployment on a permanent basis, and whilst welcoming the promise to administer with more elasticity the existing Act and to provide more money to make that possible, this House is of opinion that the proposals made are quite inadequate to meet the pressing needs of the unemployed this winter, and that the responsibility for the absence of proper machinery even for carrying out existing powers and the general unpreparedness of the country to meet the present unemployed crisis is due to the neglect of the Government to make provision for a state of affairs which was clearly foreseen.'—(Mr. Keir Hardie.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Resolution."

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. JOHN BURNS, Battersea): The clear, comprehensive, and kindly speech made by the Prime Minister last Wednesday on the broad plan and general proposals of the Government as to future legislation and future work on behalf of the unemployed, reform of the Poor Law, and such problems as vagrancy which arise out of this difficult subject, renders my task simpler and humbler than it otherwise would have been, and I thank him, as I have a right to thank him, for the powerful, loyal, and cogent way in which he dealt with this difficult subject, a way in which I venture to say few other men in the kingdom could so ably have done. My duty to-night is to deal with a transient policy we have adopted to cope with a temporary depression, and to set forth what the Government has done by administration, by organisation, and by helping local authorities in this very difficult problem. It is only right that I should tell the House of Commons, especially after what they have heard this afternoon, that, in the absence of direct and matured guidance from the tribunal which all of us agreed should be appointed when the temporary Act of 1905 was instituted, we have no right to adopt any schemes, however sentimental they may be, or to embark on any project with which, according to those who have spoken this afternoon, it is reasonable to assume the Commission is likely to disagree. That statement in itself ought to make us pause. If it were true, though I want to know where the evidence comes from, that the Commission appointed by the last Government has decided to do nothing, surely that is an answer to many of the schemes of a far-reaching, serious, untried, and almost revolutionary character that are projected. But the House has a right to know what has been done and is being done by my Department and the Government in administering a temporary Act and in spending the £200,000 that was granted, and also what will be done in spending the additional grant that has been conceded. Well, I have a right to claim that in the administration of the fund we have done our best sympathetically to disburse it, and we have not received a single adverse criticism from a distress committee or a responsible authority of having deprived them of the money and assistance by means of which their work could be carried out, and when it is suggested by people of whose speech it is most charitable to say that they did not altogether know their subject, that we have been niggardly and have stinted the authorities, my answer is to point to West Ham, to which I have probably devoted more time than any other President of the Local Government Board has given to any fifty other districts. Niggardliness is the charge alleged against me, but at this moment West Ham has a balance in its coffers of £8,500 out of the £22,000 I voted to it last year. Its neighbour, East Ham, has at this moment a balance of £1,500, the use of some of which I sanctioned last week for the employment of 400 or 500 men. I challenge any Member of the House to produce a resolution, fact, or figure to show that we have not done everything we could with the money and machinery at our disposal to help the administrative bodies and the distress committees. But we are, I admit, confronted to-day with a situation temporarily more acute than that of last year or the year before, but not so bad, in my judgment, as the winter that produced the Unemployed Workmen Act. [Cries of "Oh."] The depression in America, where the tariffs come from, hit this country very hard six or seven months ago, but I think I have a right to claim that all the ills that financial flesh is heir to in America and here should not be visited on my Department, or on my devoted head. The North-east Coast dispute has involved those districts in difficulties, and none of the hon. Members who, from the Labour point of view, represent those districts, have either privately or publicly complained of the want of promptitude, energy, or sympathy on the part of the Local Government Board in dealing with that area now that depression has struck it. The American depression, the North-east Coast dispute, the cotton trade dispute, and the sudden collapse of shipbuilding have made it necessary for the Government to do more this year than they have done on previous occasions, and we decided, as far back as March, when I addressed the municipal corporations of this country, to accelerate all our efforts, and to anticipate winter distress by the various methods to which I intend to refer later on. The House has heard the suggestion made that it is possible for the State all at once, and a Government Department in three or four months, to grapple with the problem, and practically almost to deprive unemployment of its sting and poverty of its misery. The men who buoy up the working classes with that illusion, that groundless expectation, are doomed to a disappointment of which they will be the first to hear from the working classes themselves. The causes of unemployment are so numerous; they strike so deep; they are social, economic, personal, and political. They are not created in a year and cannot be dissipated in a month. They are the accumulation of ages; the heritage of past neglect; the burden of ignorance and selfishness; the result of communities of men disobeying natural as well as economic laws; and not one single Act nor one gle Department will be able at once remove either the follies of communities, the neglect of ages, or the excesses and dissipations of individuals. I am to be commiserated. Because of what other Departments might have done, and should have done, and did not do, all the criticisms of hon. Members are poured on the devoted head of the President of the Local Government Board. I do not mind. As I said last year I do not object to being treated as the "Derby dog" of the Government on this question; but I do suggest that, in criticising myself or my Department, the origin of the complaint, the disease itself, the remedy, the palliatives which are under review, and the seriousness of them shall not be lost sight of in the personal obsessions which afflict some people when they are putting forward their solution of such a problem as this. May I give an instance? Last Friday I received a deputation from the Navvies' Mission, a very good organisation, approved of by the Navvies' representative in this House. It was headed by the Bishop of Croydon, Canon McCormack, and five or six kindly ladies and gentlemen who, not knowing what the Government proposals were, asked me to be very careful in spending public money upon works during the coming winter, and above all in sanctioning the expenditure of money by municipal authorities, not to displace from employment the regular navvy, a trained and efficient individual, who had the first claim, and in my opinion the strongest claim, to employment in such undertakings. We have done our best to avoid this. I find that for three years the building trade has been depressed, and in that connection I may say that that trade has hitherto provided two-thirds of the men registered at the unemployed depots. The depression in the building trade is not due to inactivity on the part of the Local Government Board. There are 1,250,000 men in the building trade in this country, and the men, women and children dependent upon that great industry number from three-and-a-half to four millions, and all the trades dependent on that industry have also suffered. That depression is due, not altogether to the fact that we are a vanishing race, with dying trades and disappearing industries, and therefore not requiring factories and workshops, but to the fact that there has been overbuilding in the past. The depression has occurred partly because some of the country's staple trades—coal, iron, steel, cotton, and wool—have attracted cheap capital that ordinarily would have gone to the building trade. The result is that the building trade has suffered from dear capital and high interest; that has created unemployment to an extraordinary extent, and brought about the result that for the last three or four years local authorities have been unable to borrow at low rates—we have had a bank rate of 4, 5, 6, and even 7 per cent. Another cause different from those I have enumerated, of which the Labour Members must take note, and for which no Government or municipality can possibly be responsible, is the change in the method of constructing buildings which has gone on rapidly in the last five or six years, and which has affected skilled artisans even more than the unskilled labourers. Owing to this exceptional condition of things we, anticipating distress this winter, decided to see what we could do to prevent that distress. Immediately cheap money became obtainable, about six months ago—I did my best to inform the local authorities that the deficiency of employment which might reasonably be expected in 1908-9, and which was due to dear money in 1906 and 1907, ought to be provided against, now that cheap money was obtainable, and that if they had any works of definite public utility to the execution of which public money and labour could be applied, we would only be too happy to assist them to undertake them. We always had skilled artisans particularly in mind. In September, 1908, there were 16 per cent. more labourers employed in the building trade than in September, 1907; but there were 8 or 9 or 10 per cent. fewer skilled artisans at work in the same trade than there were a year ago. This year, in London there are some, although not many, more unskilled labourers at work than there were last year; but the proportion of skilled artisans out of employment remains as large as it was last year, and in some trades it is worse. Being a mechanic and an engineer, who, in this matter, hoped not to be "hoist with his own petard," I thought it was our duty to do something that would at once bring the skilled artisan into employment, and we selected loan work for that purpose. It has an advantage over other forms of employment for this purpose in that the ordinary workman known to the contractor, the surveyor, or the engineer, gets the first call according to his known character, ability, and deserts; the ratepayers through the ordinary channels get good work at a contract or estimated price; and the profit with the contractor prevents that malingering which too frequently prevails on State or municipal works. The work is work that has to be done, and such as the ratepayers have sanctioned; and if there is loss upon it there is dismissal, while if there is no bad result therefrom, everyone profits. Moreover, on loan work the electoral influence brought to bear upon councillors or Members of Parliament is at a minimum. The right men get the right work at the right place and the right time, without the demoralising effect that too often occurs to good workmen from recurring relief works, and which are too well known for me to emphasise further. The effect of this is that we have been able to do that which I shall now submit to the House. I know no more industrious man than a Member of this House, and certainly no more industrious man than the average Minister, whether in or out of office. We take no particular credit for our work, but we certainly have a right to say that it has been our object to anticipate distress by preventing it. We have endeavoured to do that by putting into operation some £2,000,000 or £3,000,000 of loan work. Now I come to the financial aspect. In nine months of the present year the Local Government Board has sanctioned loans to the amount of £9,418,000, or more than during the whole of the previous twelve months. From 1st June to 22nd October, the Local Government Board has sanctioned loans amounting to £959,403 more than in the corresponding period of 1907. From 1st August to 22nd October for unemployed purposes alone the Board has sanctioned £859,000 worth of work as against £8,090 in the corresponding period of the previous year. In the week ending 10th October the Department sanctioned seventy-two loans, amounting to £170,000; in the following week 103 loans amounting to £271,000; in the week ended 24th October, 116 loans amounting to £250,000; or, in three weeks, 291 loans amounting to a total of £691,876; and there are seventy-seven applications at present remitted to the inspectors for loans amounting to £374,000. Therefore I claim that we have facilitated inquiries and expedited the borrowing of loans; speeded up procedure and antedated work, so that we could compress into the months from November to March something nearer £3,000,000 than £2,000,000. Now I shall be asked to give an example of how it has been done, and I could not do better than take the example of Leeds, which is typical of many of our towns and cities. For the last three years Leeds has been interesting itself very seriously and, I think, scientifically in the way to grapple with the problem of unemployment in both aspects, the unemployable and unemployed, and to see if work could not be steadied so far as the local body itself was concerned. Leeds came to the Local Government Board some time ago, and asked for sanction to a loan of some £47,000 for work, and they have in contemplation I believe a total loan expenditure of some £120,000 the great bulk of which will be produced in the slack period in the coming six months. This work is not for mere charitable purposes, but is what the city needs in the way of roads, sewerage, drainage, parks, tramways, and electric lighting extension and improvement. At this moment Leeds has out of employment a larger number of men who normally keep to this particular class of work than usual, so that on the loan being sanctioned the work will not be done at a loss either to the local authority or to the men who are engaged in their ordinary industrial trades. But for the Local Government Board speeding up the work it might have been delayed till May, June, or August, when, on the resumption of prosperity in these trades, the men would have been provided with work elsewhere. But in addition to this, Leeds has collected some £20,000 from its citizens which will be spent on the pe of work to which the Prime Minister referred when he spoke of certain works requiring Government subvention. With this money the corporation of Leeds will be levelling rough ground, making lake, grading roads in parks and open spaces, and on that work will be employed a number of men who would be ordinarily employed in other occupations; unemployable many of them, others unemployed from other trades who are not capable of the full output of the work on which they are temporarily engaged. If that work is carried out usefully, sensibly, and generously, I will go to the Leeds Corporation on behalf, not of the Government, but of the House of Commons and the people as a whole, and say that the difference between what the work would have cost under contract labour and what it will cost because unemployed wool-staplers and others have been employed, I will make good up to 30 per cent. from the Government grant. Beyond that, the corporation of Leeds, I am informed, has taken £10,000 from the profits of their municipal undertakings to distribute among men, women, and children incapable of being employed on the loan or relief works, but who might be engaged in very minor tasks, which, after all, is only well-directed charity. If you multiply this a hundred times in different localities and in proportion to the poverty and unemployment of each area you will find that we have been able to bring into work an enormous sum of money that otherwise would not have been spent. What are the Government doing in other directions? We say that these criticisms have been made in innocent ignorance, or, as Dr. Johnson would have said: "In pure ignorance of the facts." It has been said that the Department of Woods and Forests should do this, that, and the other. I take the Department of Woods and Forests because it has been mentioned in debate. Well, that Department is to have a new office in Parliament Square. My right hon. friend the First Commissioner of Works has thought that it is practicable to begin that work some months sooner than had been intended, thereby spending a very large sum of money and finding employment for at least 100, and probably 200, men on the building. Beyond that we have decided to spend £10,000 on road-making. The Board of Agriculture have done their best in the eight or nine months since the Small Holdings Act was passed to acquire 14,000 acres for small holdings, and, anxious to have a beginning in afforestation, they have purchased 13,000 acres for that purpose. Beyond that the ninety housing schemes which I have been doing my best to push forward will provide that which otherwise would not have been available. It may interest the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydvil to know that while, like Ulysses, he was taking his world tour I was not unmindful of the claims of the poor industrial workers, and was doing my best to hurry up the housing scheme in the hope of giving work this winter to the hon. Member's own constituents. The hon. Member probably does not know it, but I have already had an application for sanction (and I hope I have practically sanctioned it) to a loan of £22,600 for a castle, park, and recreation ground, in the titivation of which I hope that some of the hon. Member's constituents will find honest, decent, and profitable employment. The next department to which I have a right to refer is the Office of Works, which I have mentioned incidentally in connection with the Department of Woods and Forests, and which at this moment have given the Central (Unemployed) Body all the facilities they possibly could in nine of the ten Royal parks in or around London. We hope that some 500 or 600 men at least will be employed there in the winter. The First Commissioner has ante-dated and speeded up the extension of the Tate Gallery and a number of other minor works, whilst the Admiralty, who we are told have been leaden-footed and tardy in dealing with this problem, have given employment to 2,100 men on repairs at a cost of £73,000, and have expedited orders to enable contractors to spend at least £200,000 six months sooner than they would otherwise have done, and contracts have been and will be fixed for the expenditure of £2,500,000 sooner than would otherwise have been the case. The War Office, in a similar manner, has done its best by not reducing work, by enlisting for the Special Reserve, and by giving work in the right direction. May I also say that the Board of Trade, whose active operations in the provision of work cannot immediately bear fruit, are considering, and, I trust, devising, improved methods of securing information which may enable them to establish an efficient system of labour exchanges and bureaux, linked up in such a way all through the kingdom that they will be able to be used as an auxiliary for helping the unemployed and for the purposes of migration, in some cases of emigration, for relationship of employer and employed, and, I hope, for differentiating the honest workmen from those who are disinclined to work. In all these ways we anticipate that by March next we shall have brought into fruitful development something like £5,000,000, which would not otherwise have been spent, or £2,000,000 more than was spent on the Lancashire cotton famine in 1862-3-4. I may be asked why the local authorities have been chosen for this method. I will tell the House. I am not in favour of the intervention of the central authority, the State, at this moment, for a temporary emergency, a passing depression, while we are considering, pending the report of the Royal Commission, how best we can act in the future. For instituting large relief schemes the local authorities are the best for the simple fact that there are so many of them, and because they can deal with a problem that is proportionately as acute sometimes in a village of fifty people as in a city of 5,000,000. They command resources for exceptional work better than a central State department can. Their present officers are the reserve officials whom the Local Government Board can call on to extemporise work; their experience of the deserving is greater than that of any central authority. We cannot persuade the local authorities to adopt any means by which the rates would be secured unless we persuade and educate them gradually, for in the last resource the Local Government Board has to rely on them for money, officers, discrimination, tools, land, and other facilities by which any scheme for unemployment can be undertaken. Now, the next proposal for which we ask the consideration of the House is this. Beyond the measures I have mentioned is what we propose to do with regard to the further relaxation of the provisions of the Regulations under the Unemployed Workmen Act. The Government first increased the grant to £300,000. We propose to relax the existing regulations so as to allow: (a) Assistance to be given in proper cases to persons who had received Poor Law relief during the last twelve months; and (b) to remove the disqualification of persons who were assisted under the Act in each of the last two years. We will continue between now and March next, to expedite the loans, and bring more work into operation; we will press on the local authorities the need of executing further works during the winter, and do our best to urge those people who are able to do it, to make voluntary contributions. Beyond that I propose—to add to what the Prime Minister said last Wednesday—to give a liberal interpretation as regards the character of the work to be aided out of the grant. I mean by that, we shall not confine it wholly to parks and open spaces, to lake-making, and ground levelling, particularly in those areas where those opportunities and facilities are denied to them by reason of their character and density of population. Generally, we hope in a sane and practical and adaptable way to keep the situation between now and March next less acute than it would otherwise be. We shall be asked, as we have been asked, why we did not amend the Act, and allow the 1d. rate. The Prime Minister, in my judgment, easily and successfully disposed of the argument for a 1d. rate. A 1d. rate over all the areas of the eighty-nine distress committees, would only bring in £232,000. Not more than thirty out of the eighty-nine would be found to ask for money, and twenty-four out of the total of distress areas could not realise more than something like £60,000 to £66,000. As has been pointed out, the more distressed the area the higher its rates, and it is impossible for us to ask them to add to their already burdensome rates. We decided to adopt loans as against the 1d. rate, and I believe that in so doing we shall be justified by the House.

I come to London, if I may, because it is the storm-centre of the unemployed movement. I deal with don, because a few persons have been about the number of people who are out of work. I heard with surprise the statement made that there were from 6,000,000 to 7,000,000 of people dependent upon 2,000,000 or 3,000,000 breadwinners out of work.

*MR. KEIR HARDIE: May I ask whether the figures are mine? If that be so, the right hon. Gentleman cannot have heard them.

*MR. JOHN BURNS: All I can say is that the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydvil spoke of from two millions to three millions of men out of work, and from six millions to six and three-quarter millions of people who were dependent upon them.

*MR. KEIR HARDIE: For the country as a whole.

*MR. JOHN BURNS: Certainly, I am quite content to leave the figures as the hon. Member left them. They furnish their own refutation, and it is needless for me to enlarge upon them. But I do say this, that if the figures were anything like what he mentions, and that men have been out, as he said, from six, twelve, and eighteen months, then the awful misery, poverty, and destitution arising from unemployment would have reflected itself—even if the number was two millions—in the figures for the year as to pauperism. What are the facts? I am not dependent upon figures, but I must resist the suggestion that we have six millions of people out of work and in misery. If it be true, taking the lowest computation, it would have reflected itself, as I have said, in figures as to pauperism enlarged to an extent that we have never had before. In 1907, in London, 24·1 per 1,000 of its people were paupers; in 1908 it was 24·7 only. In England and Wales last year it was 21·5 per 1,000, and at this moment it is 21·9. In no sense can it be said that either facts or reasonable assumption warrant the extravagant statements made by the hon. Member. Let me give another striking fact. At this moment, in London out of thirty-one boards of guardians, fifteen show a reduction of pauperism as compared with last year. It is true that there are three or four parishes in the East End of London, to which I have been giving advice, when I have not been correcting them for the error of their ways, where there is extra trouble. Let me deal with the East End of London, and I ask the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydvil to listen to these figures in the light of the allegations which he has made. There are seven East End parishes with a population of 715,739, and they had 25,826 paupers. Of the seven parishes, three showed a diminution of pauperism, and four showed an increase, the whole seven together showing an increase of 2,883, of which Poplar was responsible for 2,673. Why do I dwell upon that? Because these parishes in the East of London have been the Mecca of social reformers, the right-to-work advocates, and of people who think that short cuts to the millennium can be secured without sterilising the independence and morale of the people. There is a lesson to be learnt from these short cuts: one is this. In one of these parishes, 52 per cent. of the old people of seventy years of age on 1st January next will be deprived of the old-age pension because they have been disqualified for receiving it in consequence of indiscriminate charity, put upon them by mistaken friends who have made them paupers instead of free and independent workers. [A LABOUR MEMBER: Is that something to be proud of?] No, it is not. [A LABOUR MEMBER: You seem to be proud of it.] On the contrary, I am giving that serious and significant fact to warn the House and the working classes throughout the country that indiscriminate charity and mistaken philanthropy at other people's expense, and relief works badly organised and badly conducted, make for universal bankruptcy in the interests of universal loafdom. I say that because I have unique, intimate, and practical knowledge of this subject; because I have gone through the New Cut, Lambeth, through Poplar, through Limehouse Reach, and Ratcliffe Highway, feeling the pulse of the people, and seeing the extent to which under the guise of political reform, social amelioration, and economic change, good and kindly but uneducated people are having their morale and independence sapped to an extent which, if it were spread throughout the whole of the country, would make the East End of London and elsewhere dependent and subjected, and often as free from work, as certain sections in Belgravia and Mayfair. It is because I do not want that to be made universal that I have taken the line which I am following. The hon. Member for Woolwich, whose attitude on this question I can quite understand, incidentally suggested that thrift was too often taught to the working man. He, like myself, is a temperate man, of simple tastes and spartan habits. Both of us early in life, to our credit, and it is what has landed us both where we are, adopted the Vicar of Wakefield's motto—

"Our tastes are simple because our wants are few."

If for ourselves, why not for all workers? The hon. Member for Woolwich, like myself, is a trade unionist, and the man who forgets to tell the workman when adversity meets him—and then is the only time, as for all of us, when the workman should learn—that his shortcomings in the past are responsible for his immediate discomfiture, is no friend. The average workman spends, as we all know, anything from 5s. to 7s. a week on drink. [LABOUR Cries of "Not true."] I believe it to be true, but I will take the hon. Member for Merthyr's own figure, if he will give it to me. Is it 3s.?

*MR. KEIR HARDIE: The statement is not true.

*MR. JOHN BURNS: I will split the difference and make it 5s. The average workman spends at least 5s. a week on drink. Let me tell the House of Commons that it is from £15 to £18 per family per annum, and that £100,000,000 per annum spent in drink is confined to the working classes alone. Let me tell the House what 1s. per week will do for me when I am disgraced and evicted from the Treasury Bench, and once more happily resume the chisel and the file in the engineer's workshop. In the Amalgamated Society of Engineers 1s. a week, after twelve months qualification, entitles a man to 10s. a week out-of-work pay, 10s. sick money, 10s. a week superannuation, and a number of other benefits. Supposing the enormous number of millions of money that the men had wasted in a good time had been devoted to insurance against unemployment in their trade unions or friendly societies, much of the trouble that we now have we should not experience. May I give a concrete case, to put my argument clearly? In 1906-7—and I would ask the tariff reformers to listen to these figures—the River Clyde produced 620,000 tons of the best and fastest shipping in the world. That is twice as much as Germany produced, and as much as all Europe, with Japan thrown in, produced. Within a month of the depression from America striking that river in the West of Scotland there were unemployed meetings, and complaints were made at those meetings that the grant instead of being £11,000 for the Clyde should have been £19,000. And yet in the preceding twelve months 4,000,000 golden sovereigns were spent among the same artisans on the River Clyde in alcoholic liquor alone! If this were my last speech as a Minister I should be false to my class and false to my duty if I were not to tell the working men that if they rely too much on the State and the municipality, and not enough on their own good selves, it will be bad for them and bad for the country. I shall be asked by Labour Members what are we going to do in London for the approaching winter. I will outline one or two schemes. We shall have nearly five hundred men in the royal parks, and we have already 1,600 in the County Council parks. I have made arrangements by which this number shall be nearly doubled. I am glad to say that the London Water Board—and it deserves the thanks of London for doing it—by the ante-dating of its work, has brought into employment 2,100 navvies six months sooner than they would otherwise have done. The County Council hope to have £500,000 of money. The borough councils are doing similar work. I have done everything within my power to press forward work, so that the largest number of men shall be so employed. Now I come to one or two small points. The Leader of the Opposition will perhaps sympathise more with what I am going to say than with anything I have previously said. Every day letters have been appearing in the papers asking the Office to provide work for the old soldier and the Reservist. Well, the Local Government Board has been in operation with the War Office. I mention this because we have, I regret to say, allowed soldiers who fought for this country in Africa, India, and elsewhere to be treated as too frequently they are. I asked a relieving officer the other day how many ex-soldiers there were out of 133 camps who had gone through in a short time a casual ward not more than twenty miles from London. He said the number was forty-one. It has been said that the Local Government Board is unsympathetic. Where is there a deputation I have not seen?

*MR. C. DUNCAN (Barrow-in-Furness): The right hon. Gentleman has made a challenge. I was approached—not on his particular question—by the chairman of the Electricity Committee of the County Borough Council of Barrow and asked the right hon. Gentleman to receive a deputation on the question of electricity, and he refused.

*MR. JOHN BURNS: No, our friend is talking about a year ago. That had nothing to do with the unemployed, but with the periodicity of loans for electric lighting or payment of wages out of loan moneys. I have seen three deputations of hunger marchers, and the last I saw consisted of a master builder, in work, a commercial traveller, profitably engaged, and an agent who had no necessity to join the ranks of the unemployed. I saw another deputation of hunger marchers, consisting of six, and I let every one have a quarter of an hour, and I ascertained this significant and grisly fact, that five out of the six were old soldiers or Reservists. I have thought of this, and my right hon. friend and I have adopted a scheme which, had it been adopted twenty years ago, would have reduced our 17,000 casual population to 4,000 or 5,000, and would have eliminated nearly all the old soldiers and Reservists from it altogether. It is that the old soldier and Reservist should not, when in receipt of his pension any of His Majesty's Colonies, and in two years nearly 10,000 ex-Reservists have availed themselves of that opportunity. But for that simple little change we should have had in our tramp and casual shelters an enormous number of Army men. It is in a multiplicity of little things like that where we can grapple with the vagrant and casual ward problem.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: We are not quite sure whether we heard the right hon. Gentleman accurately. Did he say 10,000 reservists had left the country by permission of the War Office?

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. HALDANE, Haddington): We have arranged that to the extent of 10,000 we should allow these Reservists to reside in the Colonies. That can be done perfectly safely. To the extent of 5,300 they are there now.

AN HON. MEMBER: Suppose they are wanted?

*MR. JOHN BURNS: Does the hon. Member suggest that they would be so unpatriotic that they would not respond? The answer to that is that 97 per cent. of the Army Reservists responded when the Boer War claimed their reluctant services. Ten thousand Colonials volunteered who had no obligation to the old country. Is it not better that these men should be getting one and a half or two dollars a day for useful profitable work in Canada, South Africa, and New Zealand, than that they should be on the road, in tramp shelters or casual wards, weak, debilitated, ruining their physique, and having no strength left for when they are wanted? Arrangements have already been made for their return in the event of their being required, and it would be a very indiscreet Chancellor of the Exchequer and a foolish House of Commons that would not pay not only their fare, but a considerable bonus to attract them back if attraction were wanted. I have only mentioned that one out of fifteen or twenty ways in which we can reduce vagrancy, eliminate the unemployable, and provide profitable work in the colonies, where it is not possible for that type of man to secure it here. I could give a number of detailed illustrations of the way in which we have done our best to apply multiplex remedies for a multiplex, delicate, dangerous problem brought about by multifarious causes. But I am convinced the House of Commons is satisfied that what reasonably could be done to tide over this winter I have done. I have done it under great difficulties. I have been subjected to much unreasonable criticism. I have endured undeserved blame and been subjected to misrepresentation, but when 31st March arrives and the Government place before the House a full and detailed account as to what loans have been spent, how the grant has been distributed, how work has been speeded up, and how departmental work has enabled a number of people to mitigate the hardships of the forthcoming winter, I shall be quite content to rest by the verdict and judgment of the House of Commons. I can assure the House of Commons and the country that if they will but leave this vexed and tangled problem to me, I am prepared to worry through the winter. If they will only leave it to the eighty-nine distress committees and to the Local Government Board to devise means to provide money and to adapt means to the end of providing men with work, they will be content when six months are over to say that the municipalities have responded handsomely to the appeal of the Local Government Board, that not hundreds but thousands more men have been supplied with honest public work at the current rates of wages, and that the amount of the Government grant which will have to be made as expressing the difference between contract labour and unemployed prices will not be so large as is supposed. The House may rely upon it that, if circumstances warrant it, the whole of the £300,000 will be spent in the necessitous districts in relieving honest claims of the unemployed to which I shall be as responsive during the coming year as I have always been during the three years I have had the onerous duty of administering one of the most difficult Acts it ever fell to a Minister or a statesman to carry out.

MR. WALTER LONG (Dublin, S.): No one will complain of the length of time which the right hon. Gentleman has occupied. He has had a difficult case to present to the House, and hon. Members, I am sure, will be ready to grant to him the sympathy and support which he asked for at the end of his address. But the speech which the right hon. Gentleman has made, and the figures he has produced, only lend force and emphasis to the criticism that the House ought not to be called upon to discuss a question of this magnitude at such short notice. After the speech to which we have just listened it must occur to the most casual student that it is almost a public scandal that a question which goes so deep down, and covers so wide an area, should be attempted to be discussed within the limits of a few hours. The Leader of the Opposition predicted that this would be the case. No hon. Member representing the Opposition has had an opportunity of speaking on this subject before 7.30 p.m. That is not the only criticism I have to make. I venture to say, without fear of contradiction, that after the statement made by the Prime Minister, which opened up many important questions, some of which have been referred to by the President of the Local Government Board, we ought to have been given more time in order that we might have approached the consideration of these questions with a much fuller knowledge. The eloquent and clear statement of the Prime Minister was but a sketch of the policy of the Government. We all know the immense labours which fall upon the Prime Minister, and nobody would expect him to be familiar with the details of the scheme he unfolded. That scheme was not only incomplete but almost unintelligible without the fuller information given by the President of the Local Government Board. That information has only been furnished after we have got half-way through this debate, and there are only three or four hours to discuss it. The right hon. Gentleman, after he had been engaged during his powerful and eloquent speech in seeking to prove, so far as I could gather, hat practicably there was no unemployment, wound up by making the announcement that 10,000 Reservists, upon whom we rely to fill up the Army, and whose presence may be needed at comparatively short notice, had been given permission, of which it is hoped they will avail themselves largely, to go to various parts of the Empire; and, when the right hon. Gentleman was asked how the presence of these men could be secured in case of war, he mistook the question and the reason for it and told the House what we all knew, that when Reservists had been called for they had always come up with the utmost speed. But the right hon. Gentleman and the Secretary for War know perfectly well that, when the Reservists were called out the last time, many had only a few hours in which to present themselves. The object of the question was, not to elicit the information that these Reservists would be as patriotic and unselfish as their predecessors, not to ask what would be the cost of bringing them back, but how far it would be possible to secure their presence in any reasonable time. Here is a matter which affects our military policy thrown in at the end of a speech on unemployment, and that itself justifies the participation in this debate of many speakers who would probably not have spoken had not such an announcement been made. The Opposition will not be too critical in examining either the speech or the action of the President of the Local Government Board. We know he spoke with truth and feeling when he said that he had had to undergo much misrepresentation and calumny. I join with the right hon. Gentleman in everything he has said in repudiation of the calumnies of his Department. There is no Department in which more trouble is taken and more interest displayed in the solution of these difficult social questions. I am not going to criticise the right hon. Gentleman too closely; but, when I come to the speeches of the two hon. Gentlemen who are the sponsors of the Resolution of confidence in and commendation of His Majesty's Government in a very different from the commendation of the hon. Gentleman Motion not only condemned the Government but condemned both sides of the House, ignoring the fact that the only Act of Parliament which provides machinery for dealing with this question is one for which the Opposition were responsible. The hon. Gentleman made a pathetic appeal that no party politics should be introduced into this question. I do not want to bring in party politics, but I wonder if it has occurred to the two hon. Gentlemen that they have been supporting a Government whose legislation has certainly not helped employment or tended to give confidence to the employer or the workman. I wonder whether they remember the Coal Mines (Eight Hours) Bill, which an hon. Member opposite has told us will lessen the output and increase the cost of coal. The Prime Minister in his recent speech appealed to capitalists to come forward and assist in a solution of this great industrial problem by finding work for the unemployed. Did the right hon. Gentleman remember the language of his colleagues sitting behind him when he made that eloquent appeal to the well-to-do of the country? Did he think of the Chancellor of the Exchequer and his projected invasion of the hen roost? Did he think of the Chancellor of the Exchequer's proposed search for the twelve rich men? Did he think of his other colleagues who have not hesitated to say in the country that if they could not do what they wanted with a particular trade by legislation they would be prepared to do it by taxation? When language of that kind has been used by the Government we do not wonder that their supporters are asked to move Motions lauding them and expressing confidence in them, but I think their speeches should be of a very guarded and non-laudatory character. The hon. Member who moved the Motion began by a reference to fiscal reform, and told us that he did so because he wanted to anticipate the arguments that were to come from this side of the House. The Leader of the Opposition was not anxious to interfere with him in the unfolding of his views. We introduce them into this debate would be altogether improper. We are as anxious as anybody opposite to avoid party politics, but we cannot ignore the fact that the policy of the Government up to the present has been one which has not increased, but rather decreased confidence and therefore decreased the amount of capital available. The President of the Local Government Board told us just now that there was very much less unemployment in the country than has been suggested. If there is any doubt upon the facts it is the Government who are to blame. It is the Government who have failed to produce as they might easily have done—I speak from experience — some reliable facts and figures on the subject. I heard with some surprise the President of the Local Government Board quote pauperism figures as a reliable indication—

*MR. JOHN BURNS: The right hon. Gentleman will pardon me. I did not quote the figures about pauperism to mitigate the unemployment that prevails. I quoted the figures with regard to pauperism and said that if the statement made by the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydvil be correct that there are 6,000,000 to 7,000,000 men, women, and children dependent on workless workers, it would have reflected itself in the figures of pauperism. I quoted the figures to show that distress did not prevail to the extent the hon. Member alleged, and not to show that there was no unemployment.

MR. WALTER LONG: Not to show that there was no unemployment. If I said so I exaggerated. I did not intend to say that the figures were quoted to show that there was no unemployment, but I submit with confidence that the whole tendency of the right hon. Gentleman's speech, apart from the figures, was to show that wildly exaggerated statements had been made as to the amount of unemployment in the country. The right hon. Gentleman was eloquent as to the present condition of things and he quoted the pauperism statistics with confidence in answer to the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydvil. In my humble opinion pauperism statistics have nothing to do with the question. It takes a very considerable time before the result of unemployment makes its mark on pauperism. All I can say is that I have been at some pains to find out the root cause of the state of things in the country. I have corresponded with reliable people in various parts of the country, I have sought information from the larger centres and from the manufacturing districts, and the information that reaches me—not in figures, for I have no means of getting at figures which would be available for quotation—points to the fact that there has been an immense amount of unemployment, that it is growing, and that in many parts of the country it is by far the most serious question at this moment. If that is right then all I can say is that the figures of the right hon. Gentleman seem to point in a contrary direction. I think the Government might, as the mover of the Motion said, without much difficulty have had comparative and classified statements made, showing what the returns of unemployment are in different parts of the country and what classes of labour are mainly affected. If we are deficient in information at the present moment it is because the Government have not thought fit to give us that information. Both the proposer and the seconder of the Motion fell back with considerable relief on the fact that the proposals of the Government were only of a temporary character. I have already said that nobody with whom I have the privilege to act desires unduly to criticise the policy of the Government or to find captious fault with them, but I cannot forget—I do not include the President of the Local Government Board in this—that many of those now sitting on the Government Benches, when they were sitting in Opposition, used very different language about our action in 1905. Then we were told that, while they were willing to support our legislation, it was altogether inadequate, that it required strengthening in this, that, and the other direction, and that it ought to be altered. One claim made by the present Government and their supporters was that they had foreseen and guarded against this emergency. If they have foreseen and guarded against it, is it not an extraordinary ing that they have allowed practically three years to elapse without altering the Act in any degree whatever?

MR. ALDEN: I have complained about the Government in this respect, and I have voted against the Government upon all occasions.

MR. WALTER LONG: I did not know that the hon. Gentleman had shown his previous views of the Government with so much determination. I can only conclude that the ceremony of to-day was a much more interesting one than we realised, and that it was a great act of atonement on his part. We were witnessing a touching reconciliation between him and the Government. I was not talking of the hon. Gentleman so much as of the Government of which he is a supporter. Many of those when in Opposition criticised the Unemployed Act of 1905, but all that they propose to do to-day is not even to alter the Act itself, but to alter the regulations made by the President of the Local Government Board under the Act. Reference has been made to the 1905 Act as being my Act. I do not wish to divest myself of any responsibility, but of course that Act was carried by my right hon. friend Mr. Gerald Balfour, and I regret that he is not a Member of the House at the present time. The credit for the passing of the Act through the House obviously belongs to him and not to me. I take it as a matter of credit to the late Government that the present Government have not found it necessary to amend the Act. Anyone who shared the responsibility for the passing of the measure would be prepared to consider any suggestions for its amendment. Nobody would pretend that it was a perfect piece of legislation, but I think we are entitled to take credit for it, notwithstanding all the debate and controversy that have raged round the question, and the attitude of hon. Gentlemen opposite at the time they were sitting here in Opposition. Having made no attempt to amend the Act, it may be assumed that on the whole they found it sufficient for their needs and purposes. Really the whole thing so far as the Government proposals are concerned turns on the question of loans. I confess I have been a little astonished at the line adopted by the Prime Minister, who has powerfully advocated this policy of loans. The President of the Local Government Board also did so just now. The right hon. Gentleman told us more of this scheme than the Prime Minister. He told us that the subsidy to be given to these loans would only be given in a limited number of cases. He went on to say that when you compare the amounts to be got from a rate and a loan you find that in many cases the amount you would get from a rate would be too small, and that in addition many of the places are already heavily burdened, and therefore to expect them to rate themselves would be unreasonable. But how is the repayment of these loans to be met if it is not to be by a rate which in many cases will be much larger than a 1d. rate?

THE PRIME MINISTER AND FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. ASQUITH, Fifehire, E.): I said so.

MR. WALTER LONG: The Prime Minister said so, but his colleague argued that the pressure of the ordinary rates would be too hard, and that it would be easier for the locality to raise a loan as if they had not to raise a rate for that purpose. The Prime Minister said that the product of 1d. rate would not be sufficient, and that it was necessary to have a loan in order to get adequate funds. But what the President of the Local Government Board did not tell us to-day was that in many places there would be no loan at all. In many places no loan is required or applied for. What is to be the policy there in regard to the unemployed? In some parts of the country the pressure of the unemployed may be just as hard, or even harder, and no loan is required, and I shall be interested to know how the Government propose that provision for the unemployed is to be made in these places. I presume they will fall back on the Distress Committee. [AN HON. MEMBER: Not in London.] I will allude to London in a moment. We are told by the Prime Minister, and with even greater insistence by the President of the Local Government Board, that these proposals are meet the present difficulty. The President of the Local Government Board said he thought it would be gone in two or at most three years. Ought we not therefore to pause before giving approval to a scheme of loans which will last thirty or forty years in order to meet an emergency of only a passing kind? The Prime Minister stated that our proposals are to confer rating power on the localities, and he pointed out that the localities had never asked for that. Why should the localities ask for that? They have rating powers at present. They have exercised them in times gone by, and as a matter of fact every single proposal the Government have made up to the present moment, save the alteration in the regulations under the Act, is exactly similar to the proposals we made short of the special subsidy. The Prime Minister said that the terms of these loans would be as easy as they could be made.

MR. ASQUITH: What I said was that many of these loans would be for a short period, as my right hon. friend suggested a few minutes ago.

MR. WALTER LONG: Of course the President of the Local Government Board should have told us what a short period is. Are they to be for ten, fifteen, twenty, twenty-five or thirty years?

*MR. JOHN BURNS: They are to be for the usual period for the kind of work which is undertaken. The bulk of the loans would be for short periods, such as five, ten, or fifteen years; but the largest amount of money and the longest periods would be for remunerative undertakings, such as gas, water, tramways and such like; which would probably be no burden on the community at all.

MR. WALTER LONG: The list of loans given was loans for gas and water mains, street improvements, general town improvements, and ordinary works connected with the town. In the old days, in my own experience, before the Act of 1905, we found that the municipalities which had been forced to deal with the unemployed, met their demands by undertaking public improvements, making new streets, doing ordinary sanitary work, within their area. These municipalities instructed their officers to take on a certain proportion of these people in the execution of such works. What was their experience? Without exception it was found that the ordinary surveyors and foremen of these local authorities were quite unfitted to deal with many of the unemployed. They were perfectly competent to deal with the ordinary working man, and to get from him a full day's work and thoroughly satisfactory work, but they were not competent to judge of the men who had been out of work and were not up to the mark. The result was that when they emerged from this employment they were no better off than when they entered into it. One object of providing money out of the rates for the payment for such works is to reduce the number of men who are deteriorated in mind and body from want of employment. That combination between the local authority and the relief committee which led to proper supervision and made the work more effective under the Act of 1905, will not, as I understand, be obtained to the same extent under the Government proposals; and in that I believe, the Government are taking a retrograde step. I make a suggestion, although I am bound to say with great caution, for I know how difficult this question is and how easy it is to take a false step. Knowing that the President of the Local Government Board is averse to establish National Government Works, I am thankful he has not adopted the other and far more dangerous alternative. Apart from dealing with the unemployed question not in a permanent form, but as a temporary difficulty, surely if you are going to take men now out of work, or who will become unemployed in the course of the next few months, and who if not properly supervised will become permanent paupers, you will not have that kind of supervision which you ought to give them. When we were called upon to introduce our Act of 1905 our own experience and that of the municipalities was that the work done here in London, such as sweeping the streets, and scavenging by the unemployed, left the men as bad at the end as when the work was found for them.

remember one man describing to me the state of his mind about being called upon to do the same kind of job day after day without relief. That is the kind of work which the President of the Local Government Board rightly condemned, and I agree with him. But there is all the difference between that and genuine work, which practically enables the unemployed man to get some training, and makes him better than when he was temporarily engaged. I was glad to hear the expression of approval from the Prime Minister of the work done by the Central Unemployed Committee. I believe it is impossible to exaggerate its importance. They have not only at enormous labour made inquiries which resulted in separating the unemployed from the unemployable, but made experiments which were of the greatest possible value. I do not appeal now to the President of the Local Government Board to extend the work of the Central Unemployed Committee in London, or to sanction anything which is extravagant or will have a bad effect on the people themselves; but I do ask him to realise that it was extremely difficult for the Unemployed Committee in London to commence work of this kind, for they had practically no previous experience to guide them in their labours. If it be true that they have made some mistakes, I ask that at all events they may be given an opportunity to complete some of their experiments, so as to see by the test of experience whether or not that kind of work is reliable and ought to be encouraged. I began by saying that we have no desire to criticise the proposals of the Government unduly. It would be quite fair, if we did, for the response to be made to us—"What proposals would you make if you were in the position the Government are now in?" Well, subject to what I have said about the rate, I do not think there is any suggestions to be made better than those which the Government offer. I confess that I was astonished that the Government made any proposals at all, considering the view which the President of the Local Government Board takes of the unemployment problem. But the Government have withstood, with courage and determination, extreme proposals which, if they had been adopted, would, I believe, have been disastrous to the country. The situation called for action on the part of the Government; I do not think it would have been possible for this House or the Government to have ignored the question of the unemployed, or to have turned a deaf ear to their demands. I think I hear the outcry that would certainly have been raised if anyone had made the suggestion that you should turn the unemployed over to the Poor Law alone. I say that anything like that would be disastrous. Poor Law relief cannot cope with the situation; certainly I do not think that any good would be done the working classes by the adoption of some of the extreme suggestions which have been made in the House and outside it. But you would do as much harm if you made the cruel suggestion that a man out of work for no fault of his own, should fall back on the Poor Law, and that no other avenue was to be open to him. That is an impossible attitude, which could not be taken by anyone who realises the condition in which so many people are just now. In reference to this branch of the subject, I desire to make an appeal to men like Mr. Loch, whose name cannot be mentioned without respect and gratitude for the work he has done. We all know how he has laboured in the interests of the poor. It is to men like him that we must appeal to consider some scheme by which those people who are out of work through circumstances over which they have no control may find that there is some machinery, it may be inadequate and insufficient, but some machinery by which opportunity may be given to them to improve themselves and return to their position as self-supporting, self-respecting citizens of the empire. I am glad that the Government have made definite proposals, which I venture to criticise in no hostile spirit. The proposals in regard to the Post Office, the Army, and the Navy, do not call for reference by me at the present time. I make a final appeal to the President of the Local Government Board to be generous in his consideration of the work done by the Central Committee in London, and not to cry halt of them in their experiments till he is satisfied that they have had a full trial.

*MR. HALDANE: I only rise to offer a word of explanation on the statement with regard to the Reservists which fell from my right hon. friend the President of the Local Government Board, and which has excited such great interest in the minds of hon. Members opposite. There is no doubt it is extremely desirable, if it can be done safely, to allow a certain proportion of Reservists to reside in the Colonies. If they reside there they will keep fit and in good condition, whereas, if they remain here at home, they will probably be wandering about. The principle of allowing a certain proportion of our Reservists to go abroad where we can keep our hand upon them is not a new one. It has been acted upon before, and in the South African War they came back to a man. The House of Commons passed, in 1906, the Reserve Forces Amendment Act, which empowered this very thing. The question the Minister of War had to consider was whether it could be safely acted upon. Could we get home quickly enough on mobilisation the men required for mobilisation of the expeditionary force? To mobilise the expeditionary force, he would require from 70,000 to 80,000 Reservists. At this moment the Reserve, instead of standing at 117,000, which it ought to be at the normal, is 134,000, and therefore he had something far in excess of what would be wanted for the mobilisation of an expeditionary force. It is for the Minister responsible to consider whether he can allow any number to go abroad consistent with mobilisation. After having consulted the Adjutant-General we had not the smallest hesitation in coming to the conclusion that we could allow 10,000 Reservists to reside in the Colonies, and thus give some relief at the present juncture. But that is not the only safeguard. We have now also the Special Reserve, the men of which are under obligations just as binding as the ordinary Reserve. I say that without the smallest hesitation, and, speaking with the fullest knowledge, I can say that there is not the smallest danger in allowing 10,000 Reservists to reside in the Colonies. At present, 5,300 have taken advantage of the provision. I only deal with this for the purpose of clearing up the point.

*MR. HAROLD COX (Preston) said he thought it was common ground that they were all of them anxious to do what they could to assist the genuine unemployed, and he did not object to the Government scheme so far as it acknowledged that the problem of unemployment was a grave and a national one, but he objected to it because, instead of remedying the disease, the Government scheme would make it worse. He believed that instead of bringing any relief whatever to the unemployed the scheme would increase the number of unemployed, and that was why he was opposed to it. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board made a speech on Saturday last in which he denounced relief works; now he proposed a scheme for the establishment of relief work which was in a large part the nature of the Government scheme. Let him call attention to some other parts of the scheme which he considered dangerous. Take the question of the Admiralty and shipbuilding. His hon. friends on his right—the mover and seconder of the Resolution—said nothing about shipbuilding, but at one time they demanded that the Admiralty charge should be reduced. Now when it was proposed to spend money on ships the right hon. Gentleman did not object because it was not for the purpose of protecting our shores but to give work to the unemployed. Was there not the danger in building ships? Were they not speculating upon the chance that there would be less unemployment next year? Was it not gambling with the future; when there was still unemployment were they to discharge all the men at present engaged? That question must necessarily arise. After the ships were built and the sewers and other relief works finished there would still be unemployment, and the remedy could only be justified if it were certain that this was merely a temporary emergency. If it was a temporary measure, then the Government were justified. With regard to loans, it seemed to him that the right hon. Gentleman had an idea that the loans dropped down from Heaven. What e wanted to ask was what hon. Members proposed to do for the better class of the unemployed. The people who would be benefited by these relief schemes were not the best of our working classes. The navvies had asked the right hon. Gentleman not to throw efficient men out of work in order to give work to inefficient men.

*MR. JOHN BURNS: The hon. Member misrepresents me. He has asked what I was doing for the navy; £600,000 would be spent by the Water Board to give employment out of the loan work to the efficient navy who had claimed all that work. With regard to the £120,000, work for that would be done by the ordinary efficient men, but the £20,000 work would be done by men who were not of the ordinary navy class.

*MR. HAROLD COX said the right hon. Gentleman drew a distinction between loan work and other work. What was to become of the efficient navy? The vice of the whole system of relief work was that our taxes were to be used to bribe the local authorities to employ inefficient workmen in the place of efficient workmen.

*MR. JOHN BURNS said that if this £20,000 was only for a temporary emergency until the adopted and more permanent measure, then it would save the unemployed going into the workhouse or going to stonework.

*MR. HAROLD COX said his statement was that they were using money of the taxpayers in order to bribe local authorities. A navy would go to one of these jobs, and would say: "This is my work, have not you a job for me?" The foreman would reply: "You are just the man I should like to have, but I cannot employ you because the Labour Party is terrorising the Government and so you lose your job." Then where was the work to come from? That was the difficulty which had never been faced. The Chairman of the London Unemployed Body had a long letter in The Times that morning pointing out that it was useless to give money if they could not find jobs. They soon got to the end of sewer digging, road-making, and so on. Under the old Poor Law the guardians came to the conclusion that it was quite impossible to find work for the men and that it was better to pay them wages without their even making a pretence of doing any work. Again, where was the money to come from? It was sometimes imagined they would get it out of the pocket of the rich. But did that end the matter? Not at all. Supposing they did take the money out of the pocket of the rich, what effect would that have on the people whom the rich employed? Let them increase the income-tax; the rich man would cut down his expenses; he would say: "I must dismiss my gardener." Thus a skilled workman was turned out of work and the remedy they offered him was to dig sewers or to plant trees on the top of a moor. They all had to ask themselves sometimes: "Am I my brother's keeper?" What the Government was doing was saying: "Do not bother about one another, the Government will manage all; we will take your money from you in the form of taxation and will use it to pay people whom you do not want employed." That method of procedure must inevitably destroy the feeling of comradeship. The doctrine that people by spending extravagantly made work for the poor was no excuse for selfish expenditure. Whether they spent money on themselves or on others, they made just as much employment. The real difference was in the final utility. It seemed to him that the question was one for rich and poor alike. Were they spending their money so as to increase the general happiness of the community or were they spending it solely on their own selfish pleasure? That applied to the motor-car owners as well as to the man who spent his money in drink. They could not look at any social problem from a purely economic standpoint. If they placed taxes on the small shopkeeper for the benefit of the unemployed he would be inspired with a feeling of bitter resentment. A great Teacher told them nearly 2,000 years ago—

"Ye have the poor always with you," and they would not solve the difficulty of poverty in one day's debate sandwiched in an overcrowded programme of an autumn session. But there were some things which might be done. They could do much to organise unskilled labour, very much as had been done at the London Docks; they could establish labour exchanges, as had been done in Germany; they could train the unfit so as to make them fit. He was willing to spend any amount of money on this latter object, because there would be some result to show for it, but what he objected to was spending money which gave no return, but only magnified the evil. After all, the final responsibility must rest with the individual and with his trade organisation, for a man had no right to spend the whole of his wages and then ask his neighbours to support him. That was the effect when the State intervened to subsidise the unemployed. He contended that it was their duty to oppose to the utmost of their strength these proposed remedies which would do nothing to solve the problem but which would make the disease worse than before.

*MR. RAMSAY MACDONALD (Leicester) said the hon. Member for Preston had that day been more generous with good advice than usual. He had been telling them that they could not solve the problem of poverty in one day's debate. He ventured to say that no one would put forward any such statement. He remembered when the hon. Member for Preston occupied a different position from that which he occupied that day. Then he had been trying to go to one extreme, now he was going to the other extreme. The question of taxation and rating, the hon. Member knew, affected the general distribution of wealth. It mattered very little whether the State or the individual spent revenue. But it mattered very much whether the money the individual spent was well or ill earned. By judicious imposition of taxes the Government could discourage uneconomical expenditure. That was all the Government was doing. So far, he defended the action of the Government. The Government was taking a part of the national income and using it in preventing the physical, moral and spiritual deterioration of a most deserving class of the people. That was the proposal and the House had now to consider whether it was adequate or not. In considering the statement of the Prime Minister he dismissed from his mind any idea of permanence. The right hon. Gentleman's proposal was made to tide over a difficulty. One of the usual periodical crises of unemployment had occurred. It was found in Germany, in America, in free trade and in protection countries. Unemployment was above the normal, and the Government, following the lead of the Opposition, was now attempting to carry things on through the winter in as tolerable a way as possible. But the speeches to which the House had listened that day had shown that the Prime Minister in his recent speech had not told them all that he was going to do. He drew attention to the magnificent opportunity of the Works Department. They were told that the Office of Works had large undertakings in hand, but was the Works Department going to be as mean as usual? It was true that it had employed men through the Central Unemployed Body, but it was the only body that had refused to pay the Central Unemployed Body any recoupment for the work it had done. If the Department would only turn over a new leaf, and blot out that objectionable feature, the Central Unemployed Body would be more obliged to the Works Department than it had ever been yet. Another point which he wished to emphasise was that though the great experiment in afforestation must await legislation by the Government, the Government had in their possession large areas of land which could be put under trees at once. They had only to advertise for a competent forester and in a few weeks scores of men might be employed on this land. The hon. Member for the Leith Burghs had been conducting during twenty years on his estate in the north of Scotland an experiment in afforestation which had gladdened the heart of everybody who wanted to see the people back on the land. Whoever had gone through that estate and seen that interesting and valuable experiment would really be burning with a desire to see the Government using public resources for the purpose of supplementing such voluntary efforts. He now came to what was really the gist of the Government proposal. The debate to-day had left him a little confused on the subject. The Prime Minister in his statement last

Wednesday gave the impression to the House that the characteristic of the great schemes to which he referred was that they were to give work to what were ordinarily called unemployed men—not merely to steady the market, not to give work to men who were not now unemployed but who would be unemployed during the winter, but to find employment for the thousands now on the registers; and the right hon. Gentleman explained that he was going to find £300,000, and to provide from that Government grant the difference between the cost of these schemes as carried out by unemployed men, and the cost as carried out by competent men. The suggestion was that these works were to be carried out by unskilled men. But to-day they had been given a totally different assurance. They were told that the great bulk of the work was to be carried out by skilled men. If that was so, what was the use of the £300,000?

*MR. JOHN BURNS explained that there was no difference between the Premier's statement and his own in effect. He had said that the two or three millions of the loan money which would be spent on useful public works between now and March next would be spent on ordinary work, less efficient labour, which generally followed up that kind of work, but which was now known as unemployed. But the £300,000 would go this year to a larger extent than it had hitherto been spent in paying the difference between the cost of the work as done by contract and that done in this way. In some cases nearly the total amount of certain works would be done out of the grant..

*MR. RAMSAY MACDONALD said he was obliged for that explanation. The point in that case was simply that the Government would continue what was now the practice, but extend it, and instead of paying out £150,000 as was done last year, would double the volume of the grant. What then was the use of talking about the loans? The loans were just the normal operations of municipal activity.

*MR. JOHN BURNS: No, no.

*MR. RAMSAY MACDONALD said that if Members looked at the Papers circulated that day they would find the amount of money asked for last year was practically the same as that which had been sanctioned by the Local Government Board up to date. The amount sanctioned in 1905 was £10,000,000; in 1906, £10,000,000; in 1907, £9,000,000; and in 1908, up to date, £9,500,000. At the very best, the loans could only amount to a million or so more than those of 1905 or 1906, and it was necessary to remember that in order to get a relative idea of what the Government were doing as against what was done without Government pressure in 1905-6. They had to remember that the normal work in those years was somewhat delayed by dear money, and that in the ordinary course of events 1908 would be marked, and ought to be marked, by a large increase in the demand for loans, and that probably 1909 would be more marked still, employment or unemployment notwithstanding. He suggested, therefore, that nature and economic law were to a certain extent responsible for the pressure this year. He held in his hand a Report of a committee of the London County Council, of which the right hon Gentleman was vice-chairman, issued in 1903, a time when they were considering this question. That Report, [which was signed by the right hon. Gentleman, said—

"It is only at times like the present that the subject of unemployment is generally considered, and then the aid of the local authority is invoked to meet sudden emergencies. This demand and this suggestion is apt to be not useful but often pernicious in the long run, for the subject is one that needs great consideration."

That Report was issued at a time when a demand was being made that those matters should be removed from local authorities altogether. They found, and hon. Members who were present during the discussions on the Unemployed Workmen Act should remember, that local authorities were subject to all sorts of political pressure to which they ought not to be subjected. They therefore thought that the whole work of dealing with unemployment should be taken out of the hands of the local authorities and be put into the hands of distress committees and such bodies as the Central Unemployed Body. If the work to be conducted by the municipalities was really the sort of work the Prime Minister gave them to understand it was, it was relief work of the worst kind. It was either useful or useless. If it was useless it was abominably bad relief work; if it was useful, it simply meant that they were putting unskilled men to do the work that skilled men would do and thereby they were mortgaging the future. If that was so it was not sufficient to give the municipalities the difference between the cost of skilled and unskilled labour, because a municipality anticipating a loan which naturally would only be asked for in, say, 1911, and asking for it in 1908, was upsetting its financial arrangements, and undertaking burdens which normally it would not, and ought not, to be asked to undertake. Therefore the relief the Government should give to such municipalities should be the difference between the cost of the work plus, say, anything between 10 per cent. and 20 per cent. of the value of the work done, in order to recoup them for other burdens. But the whole purpose of the Unemployed Workmen Act, and this was the gravamen of the charge against the Government, was to take from the public authorities—and experience had shown that whilst the public authorities did this they were subject to most illegitimate influences—the responsibility of providing work for the unemployed. Why was it that in the Prime Minister's speech not a single word was said about distress committees as agents for the administration of this fund. They were told only to-day that no grant was going to be given except where there were distress committees. That showed how subordinate distress committees had become. This was the position. The Act of 1905 was passed for the purpose of enabling them to experiment in treating the unemployed. It created distress committees in the provinces and a Central Unemployed Body in London. The Local Government Board was charged by that Act to give these authorities certain facilities and powers. It had not carried out its duties. The Prime Minister told them the Government was preparing to deal with a specially bad time of unemployment, and he went back to precisely the position they were in in 1905 before that Act was passed, and he had not got a single word to say about the development of the powers and the opportunities of the distress committees. The fact was that distress committees at present were at their wits end to provide work for the unemployed. The municipalities had shunted off the responsibility to a very large extent on to the distress committees where they existed, carrying out the idea of the right hon. Gentleman in the Report.

*MR. JOHN BURNS: No. I was one of the few men on that side of the House who predicted that the Unemployed Workmen Act whispered relief to the ear, and broke it to the hope, and to the extent that the Imperial Parliament gave a subvention for local work, so would the municipalities shirk their obligation to the community and to the workmen; and it has come true, I am sorry to say.

*MR. RAMSAY MACDONALD said the right hon. Gentleman's statement was right, but in this report he took up the position that the municipalities, when they were asked at times of special distress to provide work for the unemployed, would provide useless work and do it badly, and the whole thing foreshadowed in the paragraph from which he had been reading was some independent authority looking after this particular kind of work. But if the prophecy of the right hon. Gentleman had been fulfilled, and the distress committees had done so very little, fortunately for him it had been in his hand to have defeated that doleful prophecy of his, and the result was that the prophet in this respect was Providence, and he was able to defeat the purpose of the Act by carrying out his own intentions and preventing the administration of the Act. The grave omission that they found in the statement was this, and it was a supreme omission. As the hon. Member for Woolwich had pointed out, the difficulty with the distress committees had not been so much the want of money. The right hon. Gentleman had told them n the most gay way that some committee had £3,000 in hand and another £1,200. But why? Because they had not finished their work—they had unfinished schemes in hand.

*MR. JOHN BURNS: You cannot accuse me of niggardliness on the one hand and extravagance on the other. The fact is I gave West Ham last year £21,000; £7,000 was put aside for emigration and the rest was given them for works. The balance in hand only six weeks ago was £1,500 on works and over £7,000 for emigration. I sincerely regret it, but I in no way restricted the activities of West Ham either for emigration or for works. It was due to the fact that I gave them all they asked for. Their ability to provide work was not proportionate to my generosity. That was not my fault, but West Ham's misfortune.

*MR. RAMSAY MACDONALD said that was exactly his point. The emigration scheme for some reason did not come off, and they were left with money but the money was earmarked, and the money that was still to be spent on work had to be spent upon work which was not finished.

*MR. JOHN BURNS: No, the hon. Member is entirely mistaken. Immediately they came to me with the information that they had a balance I at once did what any sensible man would do. I sent for the secretary of the distress committee and said: "Bring schemes of work so that you can at once start spending the £7,000," and we are mutually engaged in promoting that useful measure.

*MR. RAMSAY MACDONALD said that was exactly it. They brought schemes of work, and now they were carrying them out. If they had any unexpended balance upon the work it was owing to the fact that they found it practically impossible to find new work. He was not quite sure whether, as a matter of fact, they had an unexpended balance, but if they had it was because their work was not exhausted. Before it was exhausted the whole of the money would be spent, so that the balance was only a fictitious one. If on the other hand they had not enough work to enable them to spend money it was owing to the fact that distress committees were beginning to experience more and more the difficulty of finding enough work. That was the whole of his argument. There was no man in the whole country to whom they owed more than to the Chairman of the Central Unemployed Body, Mr. Russell Wakefield, for the laborious work he had put into the solution of this intricate problem. In a letter which he had sent to the papers that morning he made this important point—

"But all this" (that was the money) "will not suffice; and one does not see where to turn in order to find some employment for a large number of men really deserving and capable of earning very nearly 100 per cent. of their wages. I trust that some of you may be able to assist in this matter, but I cannot help feeling that the Government has accepted to some extent the responsibility. They tell us that the problem is serious; they say, we will make it easy for men to apply for work; they add, we will do our best to supply a generous amount of money; but at the present moment they would be doing infinitely more for us, for London especially, if they would show us something, if possible national work, that our people may be employed upon."

That was the important point at present. Hon. Members must not be misled by the quotation of large sums of money which were being thrown at distress committees. The distress committees wanted work, and the duty of the Government had been just as much to tell them how to provide work, because it could not be provided locally, though it could be provided nationally. They had no machinery for this. The right hon. Gentleman said they never had any complaints from distress committees. It all depended on what they meant by complaints. He was the Chairman of a committee of the Central Body, and they were constantly complaining about the right hon. Gentleman. He told them he had refused no deputation, but he had refused deputations from the Central Unemployed Body, and he had refused in answer to the hon. Member for Manchester to receive a deputation from the Municipal Corporations Association.

*MR. JOHN BURNS: That was not on the unemployed question at all. It was a question of electricity loans, as to whether the salaries of permanent officials and the wages of permanent men should be paid out of loans.

MR. CLYNES (Manchester, N.E.): My information in connection with that deputation is entirely different.

*MR. RAMSAY MACDONALD said he was not mistaken about the women's work deputation. The Board did not receive it, but requested them to put their demands in writing and the Board would consider them. But then that was not the only test. They would like to know whether any local authority entitled to appoint a distress committee under the Unemployed Workmen Act asked that a distress committee should be appointed and met with a refusal. A public authority responsible to electors was allowed to do certain things under an Act of Parliament provided the Local Government Board gave them sanction to do them, and if those authorities asked to be allowed to act under that Act, and if the Local Government Board refused to allow them, surely that was a complaint. The fact of the matter was that deputations had been refused—

*MR. JOHN BURNS: I am very reluctant to interrupt the hon. Gentleman. I see the Chairman of the Central Unemployed Body, and have done for the last three years on an average, between November and March, twice a week, and when I was asked to see him with two ladies in connection with women's workrooms, I assented. But it seems to me if I am always to be giving what time I have to spare to endless deputations, I cannot do the material work.

MACDONALD said that the Gentleman had stated that he had a right to see him, and stand. But his statement was more absolute than any other impression to be derived from the records. He left the matter to the Unemployed Body for consideration. Their charge was in connection with this proposal was that it had neglected all opportunities for meeting a crisis except by issuing a circular and asking certain local authorities to put work into operation. The Prime Minister, for instance, talked about elasticity. He had given them a pledge that the Act was going to be administered with more elasticity than before. The hon. Member for Merthyr Tydvil asked for a consultative committee in order that the £300,000 might be administered by a committee of the Cabinet or an outside committee. He hoped they might criticise the Department without appearing to raise the question of the personal conduct of the head of the Department with whom they would be only too glad to work more harmoniously than he had allowed in the past. The two heads of the Local Government Board had been the most severe critics of that Board. He could remember the right hon. Gentleman in the old days using the initials L.G.B. for the purpose of pouring scorn and contempt upon Whitehall, and the hon. Member for West Ham had told them, within twelve months, that its methods were antiquated and its machinery difficult to move. The point that the Labour Party wanted to make was that they would have no elasticity in the administration of the Unemployed Workers Act until a consultative committee had been appointed. Taking Hollesley Bay as an example—that establishment was started as an educational experiment and not for the purposes of relief work. It subsequently became mere task work, the heart went out of the men, and the superintendent would tell them what fatal results followed. A deputation went to the Local Government Board to ask to be allowed to carry out the original scheme, and were told by the President that it could not be allowed because there was no legal power to do it. A really live Local Government Board would have recognised that the success of the experiment depended upon its being an annexe to a small holding settlement and would have undertaken to see that the facilities required for success were provided. Let them take, as another instance, the women's workroom; a correspondence was begun on 16th March—raising the question whether the committee could sell the stuff made at the room—which was not finished until 20th October. The Board objected to all the schemes.

MR. JOHN BURNS : Oh, no.

*MR. RAMSAY MACDONALD : Well that was the interpretation of the committee as the correspondence abundantly showed. That was the sort of assistance the Local Government Board had given the committee. The cause and origin of all their complaints was the slowness, the want of sympathy, the sort of non possumus attitude that had characterised the administration of this Act by the Local Government Board. If the Prime Minister really wished to give the Labour Party a guarantee that there was going to be elasticity of administration, let him appoint a consultative committee on the lines of the Consultative Committee of the Board of Education. The money would not nearly meet the case then, and the work that was required before the money could be spent would then be provided by the Government. A circular ought to be issued to the distress committees pointing out what had been successful experiments and what had not. The circular issued during the last three or four days about which so much credit was being claimed by the Local Government Board was not nearly so helpful as the circular issued by Mr. Chamberlain in 1886.

*MR. JOHN BURNS : I have not issued any circular during the last three or four days. In reply to a question on Friday last I have issued a statement of the loans. I have not issued a circular similar to that issued in 1886, because experience between that date and now shows that if you issue such a circular it is only a signal to those out of work, and to those who do not want work to come to those particular districts from all parts of the kingdom to share it.

*MR. RAMSAY MACDONALD said he saw a letter in the Press written by the right hon. Gentleman, and he understood it had been sent to several authorities. It was published in full, as sent to the London County Council, and he certainly understood that it was generally sent out.

*MR. JOHN BURNS : No.

*MR. RAMSAY MACDONALD asked why then had the Prime Minister told them that the Local Government Board had brought pressure to bear upon the local authorities. That had added to his confusion. The only way he could imagine the right hon. Gentleman bringing pressure to bear was to write a nice civil letter, and he assumed that such a letter had been written in the form of an ordinary Local Government Board circular. During the last three years some of the experiments had been miserable failures, sometimes because nature was against them. Some of those experiments had been a sort of half failure and half success. If the Local Government Board would issue a statement to the authorities that were going to be responsible for the expenditure of public money during this winter telling them, not what they ought to do theoretically and hypothetically, but what other authorities had done successfully and what they had failed to do, it would be of great benefit. They wanted the Local Government Board to take up the attitude, not only of negative critic but also of positive adviser at this moment. They wanted the Local Government Board, now that they were scientifically considering the administration of the Unemployed Workmen Act, to extend the experience of that administration. If that was done, there would be no vote of censure, or motions that meant a vote of censure moved from those benches. The fact of the matter was that hon. Members must accept the assumption that their experience of the last three years had made the Labour Party come to the conclusion that in the further administration of unemployed schemes the Local Government Board ought not to be held in absolute confidence. The Local Government Board as a department, as part of the administrative machine of this country, had forfeited the confidence of every strong-minded and strong-willed reformer in the country, and in order to restore confidence, some sort of positive and constructive action should be taken, and it was for the purpose of getting a statement to that effect that the Amendment had been moved.

MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.) said the House was not now considering what should be the permanent solution of the unemployed problem. The Prime Minister had promised to deal with that in the course of next session and nobody who heard the speech of the right hon. Gentleman on Wednesday last could doubt for a moment that he would carry out that promise. All that they had to consider now was how to get over the coming winter, and whether the proposals of the Government were adequate for that purpose. He wanted to say a word with regard to the question of loans, and particularly those loans to which the Prime Minister called special attention as having been sanctioned within the last few months, namely, those amounting to £1,500,000 which were to be spent on ordinary municipal work. The right hon. Gentleman said that these loans had been sanctioned upon the distinct understanding that the unemployed were to be put to work upon them. If that was so, it seemed to him that there was very serious risk of their employing the relatively unfit and of throwing the more expert and fit workmen out of their jobs. He was very happy indeed that those loans had been sanctioned, but so far as ordinary municipal work was concerned, or rather this addition to it, it ought in his opinion to flow through the ordinary channels. [AN HON. MEMBER: "It will."] He had his misgivings, for the reason that these loans had been granted to the local authorities upon the distinct understanding that they were to go to the relief of the unemployed. Where were those responsible for the carrying out of the works going to look for their labour? Were they going to the registers of unemployed? If they were, he thought it would be a very mischievous thing. They ought rather to go to the labour yards, the builders' yards, or to the offices of the municipal authorities. This additional municipal work ought, as he had said, to flow through the ordinary channels, otherwise it might do harm rather than good. He hoped he was wrong, but he was afraid that as the result of the stipulation to which the Prime Minister drew attention with respect to these loans this supply of work would not flow through the ordinary channels. Ordinary municipal work was not proper work on which to put those who registered themselves as unemployed. For this purpose they ought to go outside of the ordinary routine work which municipalities performed. It seemed ridiculous to him to suggest that there was no work outside of ordinary municipal work which could be described in the best sense of the term as useful work that would increase the amenity of the district in which the work was done. It was said that there was a difficulty in finding that work. He suggested with great respect that Ministers should follow the precedent set at the time of the Manchester cotton famine in the early sixties, when Sir Robert Rawlinson was sent by the Government to Lancashire to see what useful work could be undertaken. Let the Government send selected and expert men—not officers of the Local Government Board, because that Department by its traditions and its association with Poor Law administration was disqualified from dealing with this problem—into the distressed localities, and there would be no difficulty in finding work of the kind which he had indicated—work which would not otherwise be done, and yet would be useful. What a large portion of the unemployed required was not only work but training. He had intended to refer at some length to the experiment at Hollesley Bay, but his hon. friend the Member for Leicester had already dealt with that subject. He might say that social reformers in the East End of London, and not especially those of the party to which he himself belonged, had regarded Hollesley Bay as a most promising experiment, but not so promising as it might have been if only the right hon. Gentleman had allowed it to be extended. The Central Body desired that it should be extended. On the last occasion on which the right hon. Gentleman spoke, just before the recess, he assumed an unsympathetic attitude towards those work people, and he quoted the chairman of the workrooms committee and conveyed to the House the impression that the chairman had spoken disparagingly of the work and thought little of it. A fortnight later the chairman in a letter to The Times stated that the right hon. Gentleman, no doubt unintentionally, had entirely misrepresented her own views on the subject. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would not discourage the use of these workrooms, but rather allow them to be extended. He wrote to the Press some time ago urging that the restrictions on the imposition of the rate under the Act of 1905 should be removed. When he made that suggestion he had mainly in view the case of London, because if it were applicable to these works it would produce a considerable sum. The Government refused to amend the Act in that direction. If it had been so amended the responsibility would have been thrown to a considerable extent on the local authorities. By refusing to do that the Government had taken a greater responsibility upon themselves. The case of London was particularly hard. The right hon. Gentleman had stated that in Leeds the voluntary subscriptions amounted to £20,000, while the amount which could be obtained in London in the shape of voluntary contributions was absolutely inappreciable. Last year only £572 was received. At the present time there were 17,000 names entered on the unemployed register. That was a fact which certainly ought to appeal to the Government. He wished to point out what happened last year. In Woolwich there were 1,658 applicants and only 283 were helped. In Camberwell there were 2,223 applicants and only 125 were helped. The local distress committees were very sore about the way in which they had been treated. [AN HON. MEMBER: By whom?] By the Government's raising hopes and not fulfilling them. For instance, the local distress committees were urged to collect the names of those who required work, and they did so. That raised hopes in the minds of these poor people, and then they found that only a miserable percentage of the persons who applied could be relieved. In his own borough of Bethnal Green the council refused this year to appoint representatives to the distress committee altogether. He regretted that they had done so, but their action showed how they felt the difficulty of the position in which they were placed. On Wednesday last the Prime Minister used these words—

"There can be no doubt, I think, that during the present autumn and winter, if nothing is done, we shall be face to face with a large body of industrious men and women who, through no default of their own, find for the time no demand for their labour in the ordinary market, and who, unless steps be taken, must be compulsorily reduced to idleness and want. Sir, I need not say—speaking for a moment on behalf of the whole House—they have our profound sympathy. They have a right to demand, and it is our duty to give them, something more."

Let the House note the gravity of that statement. It was really granting the whole case of the hon. Gentlemen on the Labour benches. Having accepted in that statement the principle of the right to employment, the Government ought to go further and find the means for making that acceptance operative. There was a most remarkable difference between the tone of the Prime Minister and that of the President of the Local Government Board. Nothing could exceed the gravity of the emergency in the opinion of the Prime Minister. His language was as grave as it was possible to be, but, from the speech of the President of the Local Government Board that night one would have thought that there was scarcely any emergency at all. In fact the President of the Local Government Board had never recognised the gravity of the case, and it was clear that he did not recognise it that night. He appealed most respectfully to the Prime Minister to give some assurance to the House before the debate closed that the spirit of the statement he had quoted would be carried out by the Government.

*MR. HELME (Lancashire, Lancaster) congratulated the President of the Local Government Board on securing the help of the Admiralty and Board of Works in anticipating necessary expenditure, and said the work proposed to be given by the Government plan in different localities would be most helpful to the districts to which it applied. In the matter of unemployment prevention was better than cure, and that would be the case in respect to the provision of work now being arranged. He, however, urged the President of the Local Government Board to turn his attention to the case presented by the Deputation of Indian Railway Companies and other Indian traders last year in regard to the urgent want of railway stock on the Government and other railways in India. The deputation went fully into the question with Lord Morley, Secretary for India, and showed that £2,000,000 or £3,000,000 could be profitably spent in increasing the rolling stock for the Indian railways, which rolling stock could be made in this country. If the orders were now given for that rolling stock it would do away with the distress existing in towns dependent on that large industry. In the constituency he represented they felt very keenly the lack of employment in consequence of the delay in placing work in that direction. He asked the President of the Local Government Board to continue the work done in other Departments by conferring with Lord Morley as to expediting work which might be done for the Indian Department.

MR. KETTLE (Tyrone, E.) said they had heard a great deal about the spirit with which the Local Government Board had dealt with this question of employment. What was the spirit of the Irish Local Government Board? Had it any spirit at all? Ireland was not a great industrial country and the problem of unemployment did not arise in Ireland in the same shape as it did in England. In Ireland they had not solved the problem by the same would-be scientific methods as in England. There they had found a much simpler solution. They exported the unemployed to America. The people who could not find employment in Ireland made their way to Greenore or Queenstown and took tickets for the United States. In that way this country and the House were saved any effort to provide employment for them. Forty thousand went to the United States last year and 40,000 were going this year. That particular aspect of the question would be only solved when the Government had the courage to enter on a complete solution of the land question. Ireland, as he had said, was not a great industrial country, and when he saw the success of the system in such centres of light as Manchester he sometimes thanked God that Ireland was not a great industrial country. Nevertheless she had got some industries, and in his short experience he had never known such distress as Ireland was going through this winter. He was surprised that the hon. Gentlemen who represented the most benighted portion of Ireland were not present trying to do what they could for that magnificent industrial population in Ulster of which they heard so much. He wondered if they had heard of the acute depression in the linen trade. He noticed that a Question had been put as to how much of the £300,000 to be granted by the Government to assist unemployment was Belfast getting. That was the sum total of their interest in unemployment in Ireland. He did not profess to know or understand the great industrial community in the North of Ireland, but he knew that there was great distress in Belfast. He knew, however, something of the distress that existed in Dublin. West Ham and East Ham were always cited as examples of terribly poor communities in favour of which the English Local Government Board must dip its hands into the Imperial treasury. He thought in the poor Catholic districts of Ireland there was far acuter poverty than in West or East Ham. In Dublin there were 24,000 artisan and labouring families living in single-roomed tenements. The industrial depression had hit Dublin very hard. They had no statistics on the subject. They had no statistics in Ireland except of the number of the police and of the salaries of the judges. They had no satisfactory reports as to the administration of the Unemployed Act of 1905 in Ireland. They did not know what the Irish Local Government Board had succeeded in doing, or what they were going to do in regard to unemployment. All they knew was the information they obtained from living in Dublin, and all he could say was that this winter was going to be one of the very worst in recent experience in regard to distress. An official of the printers' trade union in Dublin told him that the men in that trade were generally well employed, but that at this moment 300 of them were out of work. And the same story could be told of every skilled and unskilled trade in Dublin. He agreed with his friends on the Labour benches as to the inadequacy of the plan of the Government. There were few men in Ireland, he thought, who would enlist in the Special Army Reserve. The working of the Unemployed Act in Ireland had been a failure. The total amount in aid of distress received in Ireland from the Imperial subvention was less than £5,000—less than the salary of a single Judge of the High Court. And why was that? It was because it was made a principle in order to secure an Imperial subsidy that they must either strike a rate or raise subscriptions in the locality. They could not do that in Ireland; certainly not in the small industrial towns with which he was acquainted. That was the policy of feeding a dog with his own tail, with the addition that in this case the dog had no tail on which to feed. It was an absolute mockery and derision to ask small towns like Dungannon to raise £500 locally on the chance of getting £1,000 by way of subvention from the Imperial fund. Was there any fixed ratio between the amount of the Imperial contribution and the amount raised locally? He found that it was £3 to £1 in West Ham, and only £2 to £1 in Dublin. But supposing they succeeded in Ireland in raising money in many of these towns, who was to be responsible for its administration? Who was going to see that Ireland got her share of the £300,000? He wanted to know if the Government had got any information, any statistics, or any policy whatever with regard to unemployment in the industrial centres of Ireland. His belief was that it had not. The impression that the debate had made on him was something in the nature of the effect that it had had on their absent friend the Member for Colne Valley in regard to English unemployment. England knew nothing about it; she cared nothing about it. He did not know at this moment whether the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board for England knew anything about it, but he felt somewhat at home when he found the English Local Government Board as unpopular as that of Ireland. He did not know if Ireland got £4,500 last year. He came over to Parliament without being himself interested in the progress of the Licensing Bill. He came over to try and discover whether the Irish Government had any policy as regards unemployment in Ireland, and above all whether it had any money and if so, how much? His theory was that unemployment in Ireland as it affected rural districts was due to the land question, and that the English people were doing nothing to solve the question. Neither was the Government. The only people endeavouring to solve the question were the cattle-drivers. Their theory was that unemployment in the industrial centres of Ireland was due to political arrangements in that country. They had got a solution, but it was not free trade or protection, but Home Rule. Although he might have seemed to have slipped into levity he wanted serious action, if there was any within the precincts of the House, as affecting the unemployment question in Ireland.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not wish to deal with the Irish aspect of this problem which has been referred to by the last speaker, because there are other things on which I desire to speak which do not touch one portion of the United Kingdom in contradistinction to another portion, or to the exclusion of another portion. I have to deal with a problem belonging equally to every part of the kingdom to which we belong. I hope the Prime Minister has noticed that we have now reached a period of the evening when it is by custom necessary for the Leader of the Opposition to get up and speak from the point of view of his friends. So far, not a single one of his friends has had an opportunity of speaking except my right hon. friend who was so long connected with Local Government Board work. I do not believe such an event has occurred before in our Parliamentary history. The magnitude, complexity, and importance of the questions are not likely to be denied in any part of the House, and that the regular Opposition should only have been allowed to have one speech before the Leader of the Opposition gets up at a quarter to ten o'clock is, I believe, absolutely without parallel. It is most deplorable that the Government should not have found an opportunity of giving us a second day on this question. Ground for that statement is surely to be found in the condition of ignorance in which we, on this side of the House, and, let me add, Gentlemen on the other side of the House, necessarily find themselves on the present occasion. I put in a plea when the Prime Minister made his speech the other day that we should be allowed rather more than the four days which have actually elapsed before this debate was taken, because I knew from my not very brief Parliamentary experience that it would be quite impossible to elicit from the Government by Monday all the information which was necessary to enable us to discuss the question in an intelligent fashion. The right hon. Gentleman's statement was made on Wednesday, and any questions put down later than Thursday could not appear in the Paper till to-morrow. Therefore it was perfect folly to suppose that we could enter upon this thorny topic armed with the information necessary to form a judgment upon it. Hon. Gentlemen below the gangway thought they were helping their cause by suggesting that the debate should come on as early as possible, and the Government, I need hardly say, enthusiastically seconded the proposal to hurry on the debate, not because the date of the debate would affect the unemployed, because what the Government is doing is done irrespective of this debate. It was not because a single man would be injured by having the debate next Thursday or next Monday, as I suggested, but simply because they saw that the earlier the debate came on, the less would be the meagre information at our disposal. Nothing was pressing except that the Government should get over the question, and, in consequence of the happy alliance between the Government and those who moved the vote of censure, we approach this topic in a greater state of ignorance of the facts with which we have to deal than I suppose has ever occurred before in dealing with such a question. At Question time I asked the Prime Minister to give the best information he could in regard to the extent of the distress, the character of the distress, and the classes of workmen thrown out of employment; but the Prime Minister frankly admitted that he could not give me any information. How on earth we are to approach this discussion when the Government themselves, who have framed these proposals, admit that they have not in their possession the facts on which alone a proper judgment can be formed, passes my understanding.

If I turn from the circumstances of the debate to the debate itself, I can only add my tribute to the tribute already paid by my right hon. friend to the peculiar character of the two speeches made in favour of the Resolution which in its terms passes an enthusiastic an eulogy upon His Majesty's Government. I suppose the Whips of the Party selected the Gentlemen as sponsors for this unmeasured expression of confidence, but I admit that I think they have chosen extremely badly. There was a perfunctory tribute to the eloquence of the Prime Minister which was really not in question—it is commonly admitted on both sides—but as for any praise of the Government's policy, I really heard none at all. Not only were these two Gentlemen very cold and grudging commentators on the Government's policy but they could not even agree among themselves. The mover of the Motion began his speech by an observation which seemed to be a preface to a tariff reform discussion—a subject with which we have no reluctance to deal—if the Government desire to give us a day to do so. The hon. Gentleman turned to commentaries which really seemed to me even more inappropriate than those with which he began. He began by saying that he thought the burden of dealing with the unemployed should not fall on the rates, but he thanks the Government for having introduced a plan throwing a burden on the rates. His second observation was that economic law had been under the tutelage of the present Government entirely abolished for which he was taken to task by the seconder. He went on to say that what we ought to do was to have a free and ungrudging recourse to relief works. If there is one thing upon which the vehement and courageous orator who presides over the Local Government Board insists, it is that relief works are an abomination, that they are corruptive, demoralising, and costly. That is his comment on the admirable plans for finding employment.

Mr. A. J. Balfour.

To do the second justice, he was more careful. He said nothing very violent against the Government. After a preface in which he hoped that this would not be treated as a party question, he told us that, after all, the party to which we belong had done nothing in the question of unemployment, but he congratulated us upon at last showing an interest in the subject. He then went into a survey of the economical history of the last seventy years, and posed as a sort of apostle of the philosophic Radical Party. Indeed, I heard a quotation from John Stuart Mill, which the hon. Member seemed to suppose supported his contentions. As a matter of fact, the philosophic Radicals of whom the hon. Member is a distinguished representative have always, until the hon. Gentleman spoke to-night, vehemently opposed the policy of the Government. I am not going to dispute economics with the hon. Gentleman, but I may make this observation, that it is on the Act—for good or for evil—passed by the late Government that the whole proposals of the present Government are founded. It is on the Act passed by the late Government that all the references in regard to labour bureaux and the interchange of labour, of which, personally, I have the greatest hope—on that Act all these proposals are founded. I can see nothing novel in what the present Government are doing, except in certain particulars to which I may be allowed to advert. I am sure the Government themselves will not assert there is anything new, except in the particulars upon which I will say a word, worthy of consideration. What are the novelties to which I refer? There is, in the first place, the Post Office. I do not remember that we claim any credit for the work done by the Post Office for dealing with temporary unemployment, and I cannot quite make out what the present Government are doing. I believe an hon. Gentleman below the Gangway said the Post Office proposals were a fraud, but I do not associate myself with that rather vehement statement. I will content myself with saying they are microscopic and negligible. It seems that in London, where the difficulty is deeply felt, they are going to add 300 men to the number they used last year, when, we are told, trade was booming and every labourer could find employment. That was the kind of argument used last year. Yes, I remember it quite well; it was said in connection with tariff reform during discussion; but hon. Gentlemen do not bring their statements into harmony one with the other. It is really extraordinary that the Prime Minister, exhibiting in his shop window all the good things that are to be, or might be used, should give such a prominent place to this insignificant figure of 300 whom the Post Office are going to help.

*THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. SYDNEY BUXTON, Tower Hamlets, Poplar): Will the right hon. Gentleman allow me to explain that what the Prime Minister referred to was a change in the policy of the Post Office, by which we departed from the custom of taking on for extra work at Christmas men who are partially employed, and are engaging as far as possible those who are wholly out of other employment? That is what we are carrying out this year, and the system will be extended to the provinces. The Central Unemployed Committee have been informed that we have placed at their disposal 1,500 places; and, in addition to these, many thousands, probably, in London and the provinces will be taken from the unemployed.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not see how the right hon. Gentleman's interruption—the quite courteous and relevant interruption—agrees with the figures he gave us at Question time. The right hon. Gentleman stated at Question time that he was going to employ 8,000 this year, and that last year he employed 7,700. I believe that by all the rules of arithmetic 7,700 taken from 8,000 leaves 300.

*MR. SYDNEY BUXTON: The position I want to make clear is that we shall in the coming Christmas, as last Christmas, as far as possible employ wholly unemployed men instead of men who are doing other work.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: It now becomes clear that in order to employ more unemployed the right hon. Gentleman is going to displace some employed. Let me tell the hon. Gentleman opposite who says I am unfair that I was here at Question time and he was not. If there has been any misrepresentation it has not been wilful, but has been due entirely to the right hon. Gentleman himself. But I pass from that, which seems to be a small matter from every point of view, including the point of view of the unemployed. I turn to another of the novelties which the Government have introduced into their scheme. With regard to shipbuilding, I understand what they say is that if the Navy required certain ships at once they would have been ordered at once, but that what they have done is to order ships before they are required in order to meet the case of the unemployed.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Mr. McKENNA, Monmouthshire, N.): The ships will no be finished any sooner.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The First Lord of the Admiralty has anticipated the precise criticism I was going to make upon this proposal. Everybody who knows anything of shipbuilding knows that there is no more costly way of building battleships, cruisers, or destroyers than that of expanding the period during which they are being built. If there is one matter upon which all Boards of Admiralty have been agreed it is that when you begin a ship you cannot go on with it too quickly in the interest of efficiency.

MR. McKENNA: The amount of time involved is that of forestalling the laying down of the ships by some six or seven weeks. By that means the contractors, before 31st March, will have spent £200,000, which means the employment of from 7,000 to 8,000 men. But the laying down seven or eight weeks earlier of contracts which last a couple of years does not materially affect the completion of the ships by more than three or four weeks one way or the other.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: This again shows the desirability of giving more time to the discussion of this matter. If time availed, I should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman how an alteration which makes only three weeks difference in the time of the completion of the ships gives additional employment to 8,000 men. After the explanation of the two right hon. Gentlemen opposite, I am, indeed, surprised that the Post Office does so much and gets so little, and that the Admiralty does so little and gets so much. Now I come to the last of the exceptional methods which the Government have devised for dealing with the crisis, and those are the two plans which are due to the ingenuity of the Secretary of State for War. One of the plans deals with the Special Reserve, and the other with the Reservists. As regards the Reservists, the right hon. Gentleman made a brief but clear speech in the dinner hour in which he told us that the absence from this country of 10,000 Reservists, whom we might require in the case of an emergency, carried with it no danger, in view of the fact that our Reserve is now above its normal limit. There may be some truth in that. Again we have no opportunity of pressing the right hon. Gentleman. Here is a problem started upon us in the middle of a debate which deals with one-tenth or one-twelfth of our Reserves—the Reserves upon which the whole efficiency of our Army depends. We hear nothing of it until seven o'clock in the evening, and get no explanation till the right hon. Gentleman gives us one at 8.30 p.m. when the House was extremely thin, and a matter which really concerns the whole defensive interests of the country is dismissed without the majority of the House having the smallest conception of what has been done. I turn from the Reserve to the Special Reservists. Again the Prime Minister showed almost superhuman ingenuity in displaying his goods in the shop-window. When I read his first utterances outside the House, and when I heard him in the House last Wednesday, I thought there was some new arrangement of the War Office which was going to give an extra amount of employment to a most deserving class of His Majesty's subjects. I cannot discover that there is to be any change at all. The Government are not going to ask for any more men, they are not going to ask for them under different conditions, and they are not going to them more pay. What have they done for the unemployed which they did not do last year or the year before? I have been interrupted by two right hon. gentlemen. I should be most gladly interrupted by the right hon. Gentleman, Secretary of State for War, if he will tell me what they have done by these arrangements except advertise their scheme.

HALDANE: Nothing would have induced me to interrupt the right hon. Gentleman excepting his pressing business. We have opened up the Special Service Corps and the Army Medical Corps, which are necessary for mobilisation of the Expeditionary Force. That is the change we make.

A. J. BALFOUR: I understand that doctors are out of employment. I was left in some difficulty and confusion by the other two interruptions, but both the Postmaster-General and the First Lord of the Admiralty find it a peculiarity itself in comparison to the Secretary for War. It appears that the Secretary has done nothing, but he has advertised two things. He has emphasised the fact that men may enter the Special Reserve, and he has given emphasis to the fact that by £3 they may get out of it. By joining the Special Reserve, they get wonderful things promised them: a day, admirable food, excellent lightful lodgings—and while they have these admirable things, if they are in the country gets nothing. I can make out by this precise advertisement whether the right hon. gentleman wanted to fill his Army or to empty it. I have the impression here. He emphasised that at a recruit in ordinary circumstances is allowed to purchase his discharge at any time for £3. That was an advertisement which the right hon. gentleman perhaps very properly put in the papers to give publicity to my scheme. But what has this to do with the unemployed? I have gone through all the three things. His Majesty's present advisers are one outside the Act we passed in 1905, and the House will agree with me, that they are all wanting. I cannot see that the smallest benefit or anything more than the smallest and most microscopical benefit is done to any of the unemployed by anything in the plan of the Government.

I come to another point on which I wish to ask a few questions. The Government made a considerable point of having altered, not the Bill brought in by Mr. Gerald Balfour, but the regulations passed by the Local Government Board when he was President of that Board. They have given no justification for those relaxations at all. Avowedly and obviously, the Act of 1905 was so novel an experiment that any Government would have been justified in proceeding cautiously and tentatively with such a great problem, and nobody could have complained if their successors, after three or four years experience of the Act, had desired a change, or required some modification. But I think that the change should, at all events, have been argued by the Government. Not a single word has been said, so far as I know, either by the Prime Minister last Wednesday or by the President of the Local Government Board to-day, justifying that change. The reason I brought this up is not in the least because it is a change from what was proposed in 1905, but because I think it does really raise a rather important point. The two regulations which they have abolished are these. It was laid down in the Regulations of 1905, in the first place, that no man who had received Poor Law relief was eligible under the scheme of 1905. It was laid down, in the second place, that no man should obtain relief under the Act of 1905 if he had received relief in each of the last two years. Now what were the objects of those regulations? They were to keep perfectly clear the distinction between the man in regular work, the skilled artisan on the one hand, and the casual labourer—the man who is not only unemployed but unemployable—on the other. It was intended to distinguish between the workman by some accident temporarily thrown out of employment and the unhappily large class who are either casual labourers through no fault of their own, or who, through fault of their own, are unfit for anything but casual work. Now that was a good object, and I think we ought to be told quite clearly why those two regulations have been abolished. Observe the particular kind of evil which pressed upon us so acutely in 1905. It was this, that if a man in regular work, sober, industrious, skilful in his occupation, found himself by a temporary accident thrown out of employment, and he was driven to the workhouse, his family was broken up, his home life was utterly destroyed, and he and those belonging to him were on an incline leading to hopeless demoralisation and perpetual pauperism. Ours was a real attempt to deal with want of employment of the employable, and it was to differentiate their case—however crudely and ineffectually—from that of the persons for whom the ordinary Poor Law exists that we laid down these regulations. This really does touch a vital problem, with which we have got to deal and which, be it remembered, is at least twofold. What we have to deal with in the future in this country is, in the first place, the problem of the artisan or the labourer thrown out accidentally by one of those changes in trade, alterations in public confidence—whatever that may be—which make for prosperity or adversity, and we want to have that man protected from the consequences for which he was not responsible, so that when better times come he can return uninjured to his normal life. That problem is absolutely different, and must be dealt with on wholly different lines, from the problem of the drifting population—those who, through faults of their own sometimes, do not deserve continuous employment. If you obliterate that distinction, you do infinite harm. You apply to the undeserving a rule which ought only to be applied to the deserving; and I think you encourage a certain class of employer, who ought to be utterly distinct—the employer who at the favourable times of the year looks to have at his disposal a vast amount of labour competing for employment, but who is quite delighted to throw them upon the municipality or the taxpayer during the months when he does not want them. I am afraid that by this rather rash alteration of the rule you have obliterated the distinction between those two problems, and, in doing so, I do not think that you have done a good thing in the interests of that which we all have at heart. I could not for the life of me bring together or get into one picture, or one focus, the general view the President of the Local Government Board laid down about relief works, demoralisation, and the necessity of the poor laying by for an evil day—with all which I have the profoundest sympathy—and the actual proposals of the Government. I can assure the right hon. Gentleman that I listened with sympathy to his speech, and I admired, as I always admire, his courage, but I could not make a coherent theory out of the various fragments he laid before us; I could not see in one picture his views of the demoralisation which relief works necessarily produced, and the scheme of relief works which he is going to carry out largely at the cost of the local authorities. Perhaps the Prime Minister will be able to bring these various utterances into harmony and show that concord exists where I see only chaos and discontinuous atoms unconnected by any general law. That brings me to a question I particularly want to ask the Government. The Prime Minister, speaking on Wednesday, detailed at great length and immense elaboration a catalogue of the kind of loans which had been sanctioned by the President of the Local Government Board. The Prime Minister's view, in short, is that loans are the proper way of providing for work which may or may not be of utility, which may be electric tramways, or sewers, or also ponds. He thinks the proper way to deal with these is by loan. Yet the right hon. Gentleman particularly has explained that the one thing which is criminal is to carry out any permanent works by loan.

THE PRIME MINISTER AND FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. ASQUITH, Fifehire, E.): I never said anything of the kind.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Which is the part of my statement to which the right hon. Gentleman objects? If it is the word "criminal" I withdraw that.

MR. ASQUITH: No, Sir, not at all. I do not object to the right hon. Gentleman's trick of rhetoric. The statement to is that I said it was wrong to put permanent works under any circumstances by loan. I never said anything of the kind.

A. J. BALFOUR : I will say then in more detail what I think he has said. I assert that in the last Parliament when we were in office, and subtly on many occasions, the right hon. Gentleman has made it the boast of the present Government that they were going to abolish the system of loans by the time of the late Government when naval and military works were carried out. Then does it turn on the word "permanent?" It cannot turn on the word "permanent." All these works which the right hon. Gentleman says he hopes to be able to carry out as permanent, from the tramway to the canal and military? It turns on the fact that they are naval and military? Why is naval and military work not to be carried out if other works are carried out by loan? Why is a work which touches the life of the country or the health and life of your soldiers not to be carried out by loan if other works, perhaps less important, are so carried out? There are works more fitted for loans than naval and military works. There is a naval base at Rosyth being put in the hands of the Government at this moment, and the necessity which they have admitted. I refer to the new naval base at Rosyth. That is carried out by common admission an enormous amount of labour. Why has the Prime Minister not said a word about it? Why has he refused to borrow for it? I can imagine no reason except the worst reason of all—namely, that he has too accurate a memory for his speeches on this subject, and that he is unwilling to violate the principle which he has laid down a hundred times in reference to Imperial Government, which he thinks has no application when you are dealing with the war.

Now I come to another point on which I want some further information. One of the things all of us are most afraid of making suggestions is that you may do a thing which is socially and economically wrong—namely, that you turn an experienced trade in which he is qualified to produce excellent work, into one in which he is unqualified to do such work by physical inaptitude and training. The worst of these relief works is this. There is no security that they are suited to the kind of people out of employment. I ask the Prime Minister whether he can tell us what the kind of person out of employment is to do, and I should like to compare him with the relief works to be started. The right hon. Gentleman has told us about Bradford and that the woollen trade there is bad at the present time, throwing a great many men out of employment.

MR. ASQUITH : I did not mention the woollen trade.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR : The right hon. Gentleman gave us little information, and he must excuse me for making inferences which are natural and legitimate, if inaccurate. He said there was great distress at Bradford, and I assumed it was the staple trade of Bradford. You cannot evidently help any one engaged in the staple trade of Bradford by making a pond at Bradford. What you have to do is to make that demand for labour suit the character of the people who want employment. I was told of a case the other day—which I got on report, but which I believe to be true—as to a tender made in Wolverhampton for railway material for the Indian Government. There was doubt whether the contract would go to Wolverhampton or Germany. Ultimately it went to Germany. Of course, the Indian Government must buy in the cheapest market under our existing system. Under our system I do not think they have any alternative. But I observe. It would have been incomparably cheaper for the ratepayers of Wolverhampton to have paid the difference between the German contract and the Wolverhampton contract and kept these skilled workmen doing work for which they were competent, carrying with it employment for shopkeepers and for the large number of unskilled workmen in the district, and all the collateral occupations which skilled labour carries with it. The Government, from some pedantry I cannot explain, would much rather, apparently, that the Wolverhampton ratepayers paid to make these skilled workmen dig a pond than enable them to go on with the work for which they were really qualified. Is that defended by the Government, and, if so, on what principle? The truth is that nothing is more obvious to anybody who has listened to the debates in this House than that the old doctrine—half believed in, half disbelieved in now, on the other side—that all you have to think of is the consumer, is wholly abandoned. You are not thinking of the consumer any more. The present Local Government Board induces localities to make buildings in the winter time when everybody knows that winter is not the best time. Where does the consumer come in? The First Lord of the Admiralty does not think of the consumer. Nobody thinks of the consumer when dealing with the unemployed. They only think of him when discussing the fiscal question. I differ from the hon. Gentleman the Member for Preston in many things, but he would be, I think, the first to admit that the logic the Government adopt in this matter is a logic wholly inconsistent with free trade—as, at all events, Preston understands it. What you are doing under this policy is, you are making the taxpayer, who includes the poorest of the poor, and the ratepayer, who includes the poorest of the poor, not buy the best goods in the cheapest market, but the worst goods in the dearest market. I am pointing out, as the hon. Gentleman would see if he had done me the honour of listening to me, that the orthodox, or what used to be the orthodox, doctrine, that the community was best served by never turning your eye on the producer but by keeping your gaze on the consumer and on the consumer only, is blown to atoms by the whole policy of the Government. They have abandoned it, and my complaint is that having abandoned it they have not abandoned it wisely. They have not abandoned it in a way to secure the object we all have at heart. They have not done their best to see that, although you make the consumer, as ratepayer or as taxpayer, pay more for the goods than he would otherwise have to pay, you should at all events so contrive your arrangements that every producer and every productive agent should be able to use the gifts which God has given him, and the education with which he has been supplied by the State, to the very best possible advantage. They have not done that. They have not even tried to do that, and I do not see myself how they can, after this go about the country explaining to everybody that the only way of really producing prosperity which shall touch every class of the community, and especially the working man, is by seeing that the price of a particular commodity should regulate the whole policy of this country. It does not regulate policy under their own management when they are dealing with one part of the social question, and you cannot dissociate the different parts of the social question by any arbitrary division. The hon. Gentleman below the gangway who interrupted me just now seemed to think that I was going into the fiscal question. I am not going to do so because it is really not relevant to the plan which we have been deliberately told by the Government is merely a passing expedient, a temporary anodyne. I believe myself that fiscal reform has a great bearing upon permanent employment in this country. I do not pretend, and I have never pretended, that it can avoid those oscillations that are due to charges of expectation on the part of the producing community, those alternate waves of sanguineness and discouragement which, following some law which has never been fully explained by economists, passes in excessive waves over the face of the economic world. But while I do not think that any expedient can wholly obliterate those changes and those alterations, with all the ill-consequences that follow from them, I do think, and I believe it can be shown, that fiscal reform does produce a steadiness of employment. I agree with the President of the Local Government Board when he told us that the causes affecting this question are so numerous and so complex that it would be folly to point to any one and say: "That is responsible for the whole." I quite agree. It cannot be so; but I do say that there is one cause for which we are justified in making the Government directly and personally responsible. That is the lack of confidence which all they do and all they say inevitably inspires, perhaps wrongly, but inevitably inspires, general community. By common sense, security is the basis of all industrial progress, and I charge the Government with having done all they could to destroy that security by rash acts and by rash sayings. One man will tell you that the proper way of dealing with the question is to go to the richest men in the community. Another gentleman—I am not sure whether it is the same gentleman—talks of closing the hen-roosts when you are in difficulty. You have gentlemen opening the gangway—I see a whole lot of them—who believe that the whole of the question of poverty and unemployment is to be found in robbing the rich.

THE HON. MEMBER: Robbing the rich?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I put it from the point of view of the landlords. The landlord and the highwayman deal with the same problem, though they may look at it from somewhat different or, indeed, opposite points of view. The legislation which we spend, week in and week out, all our time at present is open to the same kind of criticism. It is very difficult to say what a Government can do about unemployment; it is easy to say what they ought not to do. The present Government have done all that they could do apart from substantive legislation brought into law, to shake that public confidence which is at the basis of successful commerce. I do not care what system you have, whether a Socialistic or an individualistic system as at present, you must have confidence in it. You have lost that confidence quite unnecessarily, and upon your heads lies some of the greatest responsibility for the state in which the country now is.

MR. ASQUITH: The right hon. Member began and ended the speech he has just delivered—a speech the Government's venture to say is in marked contrast both in tone and in temper with the speech of his colleague who addressed us in the evening—with topics of which, without any disrespect to the Government, I think I may treat with the same freedom which they deserve. ["Oh, oh."]

He made in his peroration two remarkable statements: one of a positive and the other of a negative kind. The positive statement was that fiscal reform would give steadiness of employment. Before we either assent to or deny that proposition, we should like to know that which still remains an inscrutable mystery tightly locked in the breast of the right hon. Gentleman—what does he mean by fiscal reform? He told us next in his peroration that the degree of intensity of unemployment from which we are now suffering in this country was largely due to the want of confidence inspired by the policy of the legislation of the present Government. Sir, does the right hon. Gentleman suppose that that phenomenon of unemployment is peculiar to this country?

MR. BONAR LAW (Camberwell, Dulwich): It is worse.

MR. ASQUITH: Will the hon. Gentleman who says that it is worse take a voyage across the Atlantic? Let him go to the United States. Let him go to the State of New York. Let him go to any of the eastern States, or, for that matter, to the western States.

MR. BONAR LAW: May I interrupt? Will the right hon. Gentleman, then, kindly explain why so many of our citizens are going to America now? [Cries of "And not returning."]

MR. ASQUITH: I do not think that that is a very relevant question. [Cries of "Oh."] My point is this, that the degree of intensity of unemployment is quite as great as, and, indeed, greater than, in this country, and when the right hon. Gentleman talks of it as a striking phenomenon due to the want of confidence inspired by the present Government, does he compare the figures of unemployment now with those of years gone by in our own country?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: We have no figures.

MR. ASQUITH: Yes, we have the figures of the trade unions. Was Lord Beaconsfield an enemy to capital and confidence? Yet in 1879, when he was Prime Minister, the figures were much higher than now. Was Lord Salisbury an enemy to capital and confidence? Yet in 1887, when he was Prime Minister, the percentage was much greater. No, Sir, there is no fallacy more childish. I repeat that these changes are due to what the right hon. Gentleman in a better inspired moment described as the oscillation of trade and the general economic conditions of the world rather than to the action of particular Governments. Let me now come back to the beginning of his speech. His first complaint was as to the date for which this debate was fixed. So far as I can gather, he had a double complaint. The first was that we did not adjourn it until a later date, and the next that we have not allowed it to occupy a longer time. These may be reasonable enough suggestions if we were professing to bring forward anything in the nature of a permanent definite solution of the problem of unemployment; but we are doing, as the right hon. Gentleman admits, nothing of the kind. I endeavoured to explain, with, I hope, sufficient clearness for most people to understand, the outlines of our proposals on Wednesday last. They have not been in any degree modified or supplemented by what has been said to-day, and although the right hon. Gentleman makes a covert attack on them, neither he nor his colleagues on that bench have ventured to put on the Paper any Resolution in opposition to them.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I understand that this began as a contest between the President of the Local Government Board and hon. Gentlemen below the gangway, and I did not know whether Mr. Speaker would or would not have considered, in such circumstances, that the front Opposition bench should have precedence. In any case, I did not think it right to intervene between them.

MR. ASQUITH: We shall see presently what the right hon. Gentleman does when we come to the division lobbies. Then, again, he complained, and I was rather amused that he should have made it a complaint, that my two hon. friends the mover and seconder of the Resolution, had not shown proper warmth and enthusiasm in their references to the Government. I do not know what his standard of temperature in that matter is. He has had a long and very varied experience. Speaking for myself and my colleagues, I wish to assure him that we are perfectly satisfied with the measure of warmth shown by my hon. friend.

I pass from that to the more substantial criticisms which the right hon. Gentleman has offered on our proposals. I will say very briefly with what he has said in regard to the different Government departments. The Post Office is making a very substantial contribution towards the question, because not only is it bringing into employment during this special critical season a large number of people who would otherwise be entirely unemployed, but it is abolishing others. As regards the War Office as regards Reservists who are serving abroad, the Secretary of State has disposed of the matter, but, if necessary, I will do so myself. The action taken by the War Office in this matter is in pursuance of the authority conferred by an Act of Parliament which was passed by the House of Commons, and many years ago the Royal Army, so far as I know, was never opposed either in this House or in the other. As a matter of fact, if the defensive necessities of the right hon. friend pointed to a number of Reservists who, under the strongest and most emergency, be called for a matter of fact, he has numbered 134,000. What harm what peril is he exposing the forces of this country to? 6,000 of these men in the Colonies, instead of a and a dismal procession of the right hon. friend the Local Government. I am sure that the Reservists who are in the country and are lodging in the casual house? As regards I need say no more than that it has been part of the right scheme—a scheme of these industrial people are now exposed—the Militia training, with summer, it should be winter, when the day

I have never hon. Gentlely unwrung. I have never ed partly no responsible politician in ecies to try has ever said, that under instead instances is it right for the took place Government to borrow money ke place of a permanent character, and for la whether connected with the Navy, the Army, or the Civil Service. What we did say, and what I repeat, is that under the late Administration the habit of borrowing money for expenses which ought to have been defrayed out of revenue was erected into a system. The result was that large parts of our naval and military expenditure never passed under the review of Parliament, and, being withdrawn from review, the money expended was to a great extent wasted on works temporary in their character, and many of them of dubious or no utility at all, and it was high time to return to the sound system which regulated our finance in the days of Mr. Gladstone, the payment of the current expenditure of the year out of the current revenue. I believe that to be a perfectly sound doctrine and consistent with borrowing for temporary emergencies and with regard to permanent works when such necessity may arise. My right hon. friend pointed out that the burden of the expenditure now authorised to be defrayed out of loans charged on rates and raised by local authorities in so far as they are not works of a permanent and remunerative character falls upon the ratepayers in the immediate future. When the right hon. Gentleman asks me what is the character of the works, when he takes the case of Bradford and Wolverhampton, my answer is very simple. The character of the works, subject, of course, to a power of veto on the part of the Local Government Board, in the case of obvious improvidence, is determined by the request of the local authorities, who know their local circumstances better than we do and whose ratepayers will in the long run have to pay for them. The right hon. Gentleman cited the case of Wolverhampton, as to which, I think, he has been singularly misinformed. The contract was a contract for screws for Indian railways. Belgian firms—not German firms—tendered at a much lower price than the English firms. The Wolverhampton firms were invited to the India Office and offered reconsideration, but they refused to reduce their price to the Belgian level or near it, and they refused to guarantee delivery. Could any responsible Minister, whether he sat upon that bench or upon this, in these circumstances recommend the acceptance of the English tender? Everybody knows he could not. Any Minister would have been guilty of a breach of trust if he had taken any other course. The right hon. Gentleman takes a further point—namely, the relaxations which my right hon. friend proposes in the old regulations of the Local Government Board in regard to labour of this kind. I could not quite gather whether he objected to it or not, but I certainly understood the right hon. Gentleman who sits beside him was inclined to agree. Certainly in our opinion they are necessary. They are first to allow assistance to be given in proper cases to persons who have received Poor Law relief in the last twelve months. Is that objected to? Secondly, to remove the disqualifications of persons assisted under the Act during each of the last two years. I have been told of cases in which men who have been employed for two or three days in the first year and in the second period for comparatively a short time, and by reason of that these men were disqualified from receiving employment. I do not believe there is a man who would not say that that is a pedantic and wholly unjustifiable interpretation of the regulation. I want to bring this matter to a point, not by going into these comparatively small questions of detail, but by asking the House to consider what are really the propositions which we laid before them and for which the Motion asks approval to-night. The first proposition is this: Whatever may be the causes of it, there is in this country at this moment a prevalence of unemployment, exceptional alike in range of distribution and in intensity of hardship. In view of that state of things—I do not go into figures and I do not enter into controversy with the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydvil—in view of that admitted state of things, the Government think that we need not be, and ought not to be, too minutely analytic and, still less, too austere judicial in measuring the responsibility and in apportioning praise or blame. Which of us, who examines his own antecedents, is so assured in his own mind of his own rectitude as to entitle him to cast the first stone? That is our first proposition. The second proposition is this: That it is essential in any measures proposed, whether they be temporary measures or measures of long duration, to maintain, and maintain clearly and distinctly, the dividing line between unemployment and pauperism, between those who are for the time being victims of the present industrial dislocation and those who for one reason or another require to be regarded as subjects for treatment, punitive, curative, corrective, or penal, of a more lasting, or possibly even of a permanent, character. I say, further, after laying down these propositions, in the measures actually proposed by the Government, which profess to be no more than tentative and provisional—these distinctions are carefully preserved. Our measures aim at organising and co-ordinating our immediate available resources, central and local, so as to give in the widest area immediate and effective relief with the minimum risk of demoralisation and humiliation, and without prejudice to our ultimate policy. Lastly, I say measures such as these, tentative and provisional as I have declared them to be, are put forward even when they are in the character of palliatives, not as dogmatic, not as final specifics, but subject to such reconsideration in detail and additions and supplements as experience may recommend. Such is the policy to which the Government ask the approval of the House, and I submit it is a policy dictated not only by prudence, but by humanity, and one which if consistently followed will have behind it the support of the great body of public opinion in this country. It will lead, not, indeed, to a final solution of the difficult problem, but to the mitigation, if not the removal, of hardships that press so hardly on well-deserving working people in the community.

MR. ARTHUR HENDERSON (Durham, Barnard Castle): I promise not to detain the House for more than a few minutes, and the very short time I plead for is for the purpose of asking one or two questions which I thought the Prime Minister would probably have referred to in his interesting speech. I may remark in passing that I have sat very closely throughout the whole of the debate to-day in the hope that I should hear some justification for our add 300 men to the number they used last year, when, we are told, trade was booming and every labourer could find employ- ment. That was the kind of argument used last year. Yes, I remember it quite well; it was said in connection with tariff reform during discussion; but hon. Gentlemen do not bring their statements into harmony one with the other. It is really extraordinary that the Prime Minister, exhibiting in his shop window all the good things that are to be, or might be used, should give such a prominent place to this insignificant figure of 300 whom the Post Office are going to help.

*THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. SYDNEY BUXTON, Tower Hamlets, Poplar): Will the right hon. Gentleman allow me to explain that what the Prime Minister referred to was a change in the policy of the Post Office, by which we departed from the custom of taking on for extra work at Christmas men who are partially employed, and are engaging as far as possible those who are wholly out of other employment? That is what we are carrying out this year, and the system will be extended to the provinces. The Central Unemployed Committee have been informed that we have placed at their disposal 1,500 places; and, in addition to these, many thousands, probably, in London and the provinces will be taken from the unemployed.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not see how the right hon. Gentleman's interruption—the quite courteous and relevant interruption—agrees with the figures he gave us at Question time. The right hon. Gentleman stated at Question time that he was going to employ 8,000 this year, and that last year he employed 7,700. I believe that by all the rules of arithmetic 7,700 taken from 8,000 leaves 300.

*MR. SYDNEY BUXTON: The position I want to make clear is that we shall in the coming Christmas, as last Christmas, as far as possible employ wholly unemployed men instead of men who are doing other work.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: It now becomes clear that in order to employ more unemployed the right hon. Gentleman is Workmen Act shall be so amended as to make it possible to give the localities powers which they do not possess to-day. Though some localities have powers to set up distress committees, others cannot do so without the permission of the Local Government Board, and that permission has been refused. That has limited the localities which may participate in the grant. I am not going to quarrel with the estimate of the total number of unemployed. We know that it is large. We know that there are only ninety-eight distress committees in the whole country, and the fact that the Local Government Board has refused to assent to others being set up in localities where great distress exists is a complete justification for our refusal to be associated with these proposals which have caused so much disapproval in many parts of the country. The Prime Minister told us on Wednesday, and also to-night, that there was going to be greater elasticity in the administration of this money. We are anxious that this elasticity should be made secure, and we do not think it can be made secure unless a Committee of the Cabinet make themselves responsible to this House for it. We are justified in saying we shall not have the elasticity that is intended except under those conditions. I venture to say that, if we could get here and now from the Prime Minister an assurance upon this matter, there is not a single Member on these benches who would doubt that in the administration of this fund a greater measure of justice would be done. I should like the Prime Minister to turn that over in his mind. In view of the point that I have made with regard to the limited number of distress committees, and the difficulty of getting distress committees set up in small districts where there is acute distress to-day, I should like to ask whether it is even now too late to provide machinery, in the shape of some Amendment to the Act of 1905, which will enable us to go through the coming winter with the knowledge that distress will be relieved by the Government, not only in the large districts but in the small. In this matter numbers should not count for anything so far as our sympathy is concerned. I ask the Government, therefore, if they cannot respond to this last appeal. I believe if they can they will be able to deal with the whole of the pain and suffering that exists through unemployment.

*MR. HEMMERDE (Denbighshire, E.) said that in justice to one's constituents one must take an opportunity of discussing this matter of so much importance. He hoped the House would bear with him while he ventured to put before it a few points. They were told that London was the storm centre of unemployment, and great parts of the country had been left absolutely untouched. He failed to see how one could discuss the Amendment of the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydvil without considering the position that the Government had taken up in providing for or failing to provide for the present crisis. He wanted to draw the attention of the House, not to any theories, as the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition had done, with reference to land reform which he said was robbing the landlord, but to a few cases which made London the storm centre at the present time. The President of the Local Government Board took as an instance the building trade. He told them that it was at the present time depressed, and that that very largely accounted for a lot of the unemployment. He agreed with him. The right hon. Gentleman also told them that they had overbuilt, and that there had been a transfer of capital from the building to other trades, as well as a change in the methods of building work. In his opinion the building trade suffered not from overbuilding but from under-building, and, as a matter of fact, capital was being transferred to other trades because the Government had failed to carry out measures making it profitable to build on lands. He would take a case in his own constituency—a village occupied by miners; within a mile there were 1,500 miners employed. He had been spending his leisure time during the vacation in studying the difficulties of living in certain parts of his constituency, and he found that in this village no land could be got for building except at a most unreasonable price. The result was that the building trade, owing to the price of land, was at a standstill. His experience of the building trade was that owing to the neglect of the Government, in North Wales land was almost unprocurable. He instanced the case of a doctor whom he had met staying at a hotel while he was endeavouring to secure a house. The same doctor was still there a month later, and he told him there was not a house to be had in the town. He asked someone why he did not build a house. His reply was that the cost of land was too high. What did he find next? He found that the workmen who should have been engaged in building houses in that district had gone up to London because there was no work to be done in the district. That was a state of things for which the Government was largely responsible. This matter ought to have been dealt with a long time ago. It was putting too great a strain on some of them to put off this question of valuation. The President of the Local Government Board said there was no one remedy for unemployment. Quite so, but as to the way the present land system caused under-building, overcrowding, and unemployment, let him quote the late Prime Minister—

“The existence of overcrowding is to a large extent due to the same sort of restriction of privileges at home as those which free trade has abolished in connection with our international commerce. In my opinion the only thing that will suffice is the taxation of land values in order to get at the root of this great and vitally essential matter.”

Those were the words that encouraged the supporters of the present Government. They had been led by member of the Government after member of the Government to expect totally different treatment. They were now to get £300,000 with difficulty. Only the other day they were told by the Chancellor of the Exchequer that £10,000,000 were added to the ground values of London alone annually. The fact that money went into one pocket meant that it came out of another. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer made a speech in Newcastle some time ago, in which he said—

“I was in Liverpool some time ago and was given a remarkable example. Just outside Liverpool, but within the corporation area, there was a man who had a piece of land in respect of which he received £19 a year rent, which was as much as it was worth. Liverpool grew, and this land was afterwards let for building purposes, and the Earl of Sefton received £70,000 premium for letting the land, and is now in receipt of £16,000 a year for land which would be worth £700 were it not for the fact that great hives of industry have grown up. And will he contribute to the expenditure of the corporation one penny? I was given other figures in Liverpool. I was told that the Lords Derby, Sefton, and Salisbury are in receipt of the sum of £345,000 a year for ground rents in the city, and out of that enormous revenue they do not contribute one penny to the public expenditure on the place—[A voice: Swindlers]—and that is the name of them all.”

It was upon speeches like that on which he was returned to that House. He meant that remark, it was not an accident. It was upon speeches like that that he was returned, because he believed them to be absolutely true. No man who had seen the land system in Wales would doubt what was at the bottom of all the troubles there. The Chancellor of the Exchequer knew this because he began his political career in Wales, and he began his there in a sense also. Then the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs had told them that the party which first mastered the question of the taxation of land values, which first made it its own, and which showed itself capable of dealing with it, was really prepared to deal with it, and did not allow itself to be hampered by vested interests from exercising its intelligence upon it freely, would have a great and solid ground on which to appeal to the country. He agreed with him. He had learned this question at the feet of most of the Members of the present front bench, and he maintained it was monstrous that at the end of three years they should be asking precisely what they asked from the late Prime Minister at the beginning of this Parliament. They were asked now to deal with questions which this Government had not in his humble opinion made the best endeavours in its power to solve. He believed that, in advocating this reform, they were not going to rob landlords. They were just going to prevent landlords from robbing them. It was merely a question which was the traveller and which was the highwayman, and any ordinary man who looked at the question of land values in London and Liverpool would understand which was the traveller and which was the highwayman. He could tell the Government, as one of their most devoted supporters, that the present attitude of negation adopted upon this great question absolutely paralysed all their efforts in the country. What did they put forward against what was already put forward as the Socialist remedy, the remedy of production, not for profit but for use? The only thing they could put forward with any hope of convincing the country was by giving them greater freedom to produce. Personally, he thought every man had the right to demand work. He remembered that a great democrat once told them that—

“So long as a single one of your fellows languishes in poverty, able and willing to work, through want of work to do, so long you will have no country.”

Those words were true; but, if they would not go the whole way and say every man had the right to demand work, at any rate they had a right to demand that he should not be prevented from working by bad laws. A great writer once told them that there would be no need for laws to provide for distress if there were no laws to produce it. If the Government would not go the whole way of dealing with distress, let them grapple with this question, which was one of the causes of distress. He spoke in no carping spirit about the matter. He really believed that the whole existence of Liberalism in the country was bound up in the proper use the party made of the powers which they now had of dealing with the question. He believed the very existence of the party as an instrument for good depended upon it. That was why he felt bound to protest; and he was confident that he protested in the name of thousands of young men in England, Scotland, and Wales, who wanted to see the question resolutely dealt with. If the Liberal Party could not put forward a more consistent policy based on principles to deal with the matter, they would simply have to give way to a party who could. He was merely trying to get the party to carry out that for which they were returned to Parliament. He begged the Government to give the question of land reform their most earnest consideration to see whether they could not make greater advance during the next than they had made during the last three years.

*MR. ARNOLD-FORSTER (Croydon) Too much time has been taken up by speeches by hon. Members whom I suppose, I am constrained to call supporters of the Government, and too little time has been left to any of us on this side of the House to express views which some of us feel very strongly indeed. The speech of the hon. Member for East Denbigh has opened a considerable field for discussion, but I am not desirous of following the hon. Member. I do desire, however, before the debate closes, even under the very unfavourable circumstances in which we are compelled to take part in the discussion, to say something which has not been said, and which ought to be said, before this matter passes out of public controversy. It is an essential part of the Government proposal that a contribution should be made by the British Army to their policy. I want to say a word with regard to that contribution. The Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for War have both said a little, and a very little, about it. I think they have not touched the question to which I shall draw the attention of the House. In the first place, let me say, as has been pointed out by the Leader of the Opposition, that so far as the remedy goes it is like everything they have done with regard to the Army—a pure imposture. Nothing is going to happen. Not a single man is to be added. Not a shilling is going to be voted in addition to whatever has been provided for the Army. The fact is the Secretary of State for War has simply put a red, white and blue ribbon in his hat and is going round touting for recruits in order to make up the contingent which he has not yet been able to secure. I do not think the House realises the real nature of the proposal. The infantry of the Special Reserve is supposed to have an establishment of 55,000 rank and file. The right hon. Gentleman is now asking for 24,000 recruits, and he tells the House that if he gets the whole lot of them they will not exceed the establishment. There is no power, except by Act of Parliament, to exceed the establishment of the Army Estimates; the right hon.

not going to exceed that, and the whole thing so close is concerned, and so employment is concerned, is a lie. I want to say something more serious than that. I do think the House realises what is opening with regard to the workhouse. These boys of seventeen invited to join—

LDANE: Seventy per cent. entry.

NOLD-FORSTER: The advertisement the right hon. Gentleman has issued says they are to be recruited at seventeen. There is no question

I have the advertisement read. They are passing into the Special Reserve, but they are not going in it. They are passing away from the Regular Army. In one of the workhouses, where I was the other day, these boys had remained in the Special Reserve. When I asked a member of the House what they were, "Oh" he said "they are defective, Sir." My main point

I protest, and I ask the House to dissociate themselves with me in this advertisement, against the British Army being recruited in this way at all. The British Army is now told it is to be regarded as an alternative to the casual ward of the workhouse, the depot of the British regiment, to be a substitute for the stone-breaker's yard. At the present time everything is to be done to raise the prestige of the British Army. How are we doing it? In this advertisement we are telling unemployed boys of seventeen that they have only to go to the nearest infantry depot—to the depot of some regiment which is famous in the history of the Army, and to apply there for board and lodging for six months. Since Mr. Gladstone sent the Guards to Malta at the beginning of the Crimean War, with a return ticket, I do not suppose any public statement of this kind was ever made to the Army. The right hon. Gentleman seems to think that these boys, when they go into the substitute for the workhouse, a British regiment,—these boys, remember, who do not want to go into the Army, and whom the Army does not want—may be alarmed lest they should be tarred with the brush of service in the Army for the rest of their lives. But he says: "Do not get disheartened about that. There is an avenue of escape from it. You are not going to be soldiers. You are only going to relieve the workhouse during six months." The Secretary of State asking these soldiers to enlist in the Army says—

"The question will be asked how long the recruit who takes advantage of these terms, with his board and lodging, candles and food, for six months, will be committed. The recruit in ordinary circumstances is allowed to purchase his discharge at any time for £3."

That means that you are inviting these boys to go into these infantry depots and wait till they have accumulated 60s. to buy themselves out. When they have done that, every day which they have spent in the depot will have been a fraud upon the public. They will have fraudulently deprived the nation of every farthing spent on their keep. Someone said the other day it was a very wise thing to get men from the unemployed for the Army. I do not agree with that. But this is not a case of getting men for the Army. I will tell the House the life history of the soldier. I spent thirty years of my life trying to find out what it is. Three young men go into the Army. At the end of seven years two of them have vanished for one reason or other—have fallen ill or been discharged—and the third, who has campaigned, been disciplined, doctored and fed, has passed into the Army Reserve, a grown man. These are the soldiers who enter the Army. But who are these boys? They never see their regiment, their officers or their non-commissioned officers. They will never do a hand's turn of work for anybody in peace or war, and that is the stuff out of which you think you are going to make the British Army. That is a most disastrous proposition. What is the great trouble that the British Army is now fighting against? Loss of prestige. The whole interest of the country is being diverted to a branch of the Army which is never going to fight anybody at all, and the fighting branch of the Army is suffering from want of prestige and want of interest and attention. I have seen something of the armies with which we may have some day to come in contact. It is a perfect calamity that you should imagine for a moment that you can fight the manhood of a great nation if you recruit your Army in this manner. This announcement has gone out to every barrack in the United Kingdom. It has gone out further than the United Kingdom that the British Army is to be used as a temporary relief for the workhouse authorities. At the present moment it will pay any benefit society to discharge their members to military depots for six months, and pay 2s. 6d. a week and at the end of that time buy them out. It is a paying operation for them, and that is exactly what the right hon. Gentleman has invited these unemployed boys to do. That is one of the most lamentable propositions that I have ever seen put forward for the supposed benefit of the British Army. I do not believe it was put forward for the benefit of the British Army. I cannot imagine soldiers who bear on their breasts medals which indicate service, and who have earned the respect of the Army, being responsible for a proposition of this kind. Men will die for many things. They will die for love of their country, or because of the pressure of discipline. They will die occasionally under the pressure of want.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND (Clare, E.): Mr. Speaker, I beg to draw your attention to the fact that I have not heard a single word. May I ask you whether the noble Lord (Earl Winterton), who has been absent the whole evening and has just come in, is entitled to address me as he has done.

*MR. SPEAKER: The noble Lord called the hon. Member to order, and I think I should have done so myself if I had been in his place. The hon. Member was keeping up a running commentary on the speech which is being made.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND: With great respect, I did nothing of the kind.

*MR. SPEAKER: I was not deaf. My ears were open. I heard what went on.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND: I do not care who accuses me of saying what is not true. I was making no running commentary on the speech, and I absolutely repudiate what you say.

*MR. ARNOLD-FORSTER: I am endeavouring to illustrate a point which is very near my heart indeed. A man will die for many things but he will not die for the kind of consideration the right hon. Gentleman is holding out. I have seen a great deal of what is happening on the Continent, and I say that if you are going to fight intelligent armies on the Continent with men recruited in the way the Secretary for War is now trying to recruit the British Army, you are destined to undergo defeat, and you will deserve defeat. This proposal to make the Army into a charitable institution is a scandal to the Army, a danger to the country, and a fraud upon the public. Such a proposal is as repugnant to the officers and men of the Army as it would be to those of the Navy. The Army has been left to the tender mercies of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War, and if it can find no better champion the Army must suffer, as the Navy would suffer, by being subjected to such treatment. I raise my protest against the Reserves of the British Army being utilised for the relief of the unemployed on the ground that the British Army ought never to be made an adjunct to the machinery of the Poor Law. The moment you do that you are injuring a great institution which ought always to be inspired by feelings of honour and patriotism, and not by such sordid considerations as the Secretary of State for War appears to think are sufficient.

MR. CURRAN (Durham, Jarrow) said that in a discussion of this kind each section had some particular panacea to apply to the problem of the unemployed. He agreed to a certain extent with the hon. friend opposite who had advocated the taxation of land values. Those sitting on the Labour benches not went the length of advocating the taxation of land values, but they also claimed that the land of this or any other country belonged by a natural right to the population and the inhabitants of that country. Land being a natural element they thought all sections of the community ought to co-operate in working it for the benefit of the community. That was coming back to first principles, but it did not get them much "forrarder" in the solution of the problem immediately before them. ■ a few words in regard to the were taking up against the in this matter. They had no misunderstood, and if they claimed the indulgence of and, to some extent, mono-major portion of the time, they use they had a deeper interest in them than any other section of

[MINISTERIAL cries of "No, we are sitting on the Labour bill which has been sent to the House of Commons directly to voice working-class opinion. This was not a question of the unemployed problem nor of the time of the House, as a question which must be decided only by the Minister responsible to every section of the House. The Prime Minister disputed the bill put forward by the hon. Member for Hyndley as to the number of unemployed he admitted that they were faced with a very serious problem must be immediately dealt with. These were their chief complaints against the scheme laid before them on Wednesday by the Prime Minister? Their complaint was that the sum granted was hopelessly inadequate to set up the necessary machinery to cope with local distress. Their second complaint was they believed that the money which was going to be paid to the Reserves would be better spent in the direction of enabling local authorities to carry out their full and necessary work instead of using these men for the Army. His point was that prior to the Prime Minister's laying his scheme before the House nothing had been done to speed up local authorities in regard to making arrangements. Letters were being received from districts where distress was now very acute along the north-east coast. In many cases the formation of distress committees had been refused because the population did not come up to the standard required by the Act. The Government ought to speed up local authorities by making it a condition when making grants that the local authority should not go on digging holes and filling them up again, but should carry out

He wished to remind the House that he and his friends came into close contact with the working classes of the country, classes which sometimes met Ministers of the Crown with serious objection. Those who had mixed with the unemployed knew their passions. They knew that these men wanted work but could not get it. They knew it was men of that class whose passions to-day were getting the better of them. He was sure that the Government would agree that the Labour Party had done its utmost to carry out this agitation on the most constitutional lines. They had had to meet abuse in the country for asking the unemployed to wait till the Government displayed its plan, and for saying that they themselves would wait till that plan was displayed to take what action they thought necessary to see that the solution was adequate. All that was not only well known to the Ministry but to many Members of the House, and they thought, therefore, that they had now a right to put forward their demands. They thought that more money might be expended and that an immediate system of speeding up local authorities should be put into operation. He would remind the House that local public bodies were not always willing even to spend money usefully. The reason for that was very simple. They had a very large number of successful retired tradesmen, pawnbrokers, brewers, publicans, clothiers and hosiers, making up the local public bodies, and these people were not anxious even to put themselves to the trouble of spending in a useful manner any money the Government might be willing to give. They believed, therefore, that a speeding up policy must be adopted, while, at the same time, a large extension of the grant should be made. The Labour Members would do their utmost to see that so far as their local influence went in every case this money would be well spent and not wasted on useless projects which were unfruitful to the country, and demoralising to the people. They said that that must be carried out at once. If the House would allow him to say so, he did not want to raise a penny rate. It was that the most of this country were unemployed. If the Government could spend money in placing 24,000 men on the Reserve List they could surely extend the grant to £500,000 instead of £300,000. If that were done and if the Government issued some definite instructions to local authorities, in his judgment the opposition which they had been compelled, and which they would be compelled to bring till they got a definite statement from the Government, would be withdrawn. Until they got that definite promise, their opposition to the Government in regard to this question of unemployment would be continued.

MR. WILLIAM ABRAHAM (Glamorganshire, Rhondda) said he was not going to argue the question as a whole, but wished merely to make an appeal to the Prime Minister. The able speech of the hon. Member for Barnard Castle had made it so clear that certain portions of the country were not to receive the necessary relief from the provisions that were being made, that he felt it was absolutely necessary that something more should be done. He had been a supporter of the Government for over twenty years and had never voted against it, except on some extreme labour question. He considered the matter before the House was an extreme labour question. He considered it was one of the most important questions they had debated in the House since he had been there. He felt grateful from the bottom of his heart for the provision which had already been made. This Government could take credit to itself for putting forward proposals to meet the necessities of the country which no Government had ever done before, but the one thing necessary now to enable him and his friends to vote for instead of against the Government was for the Prime Minister to get up in his place and say that he would give the guarantee which had been asked for, that a small Committee of the Cabinet should be formed, not to put his right hon. friend the President of the Board of Trade on one side, but to assist him in his work. If the Government would give that assurance he felt it would be giving a very good reason for him and his friends to be thankful for the provision which the Government was making, and to wait and give them an opportunity to deal with the main question when an opportunity arose. He believed it was possible that that might be done; he was hopeful that it would be done, and he asked that the Government should give them an assurance that it would be done. The Labour interest was the main interest in that House, and as a Labour representative of twenty years standing, he appealed to the Prime Minister and his Cabinet to give them security that there should be the elasticity which they wanted.

MR. ASQUITH: I am not in order in speaking again, but after the appeal of the hon. Gentleman the House will perhaps allow me to do so. I can assure my hon. friend that in regard to the future administration of this grant, and of matters connected with it, my right hon. friend the President of the Local Government Board and I myself will be in constant and close communication, and if it is shown to our satisfaction that there is a case for further steps to be taken, and that distress committees which do not at present exist, should be set up, we shall be prepared to make proper provisions.

*MR. BARNES (Glasgow, Blackfriars) said he had listened to the debate and to the speeches from the front benches, including that just made by the Prime Minister, and he had been profoundly disappointed with the result. He had listened to the speech of the Prime Minister of the previous week, when he put forward the Government proposals and explained the position generally. That speech, so far as the outlook was concerned, seemed to him to be fairly satisfactory, but when they came to the proposals contained in it, it had seemed to him that a good deal might be done by putting their own interpretation on what he said, when he told them that they were not only to have additional money, but the elements of elasticity and liberality in regard to disbursement of the fund. He had listened to all the speeches that day, but so far had heard nothing which would show that there would be any security that the elasticity and liberality which had been referred to would be used. He admitted that the statement just made by the Prime Minister was an

That was going on all over the country so far as skilled workmen were concerned, and he said therefore that any figures as to pauperism comparing the numbers with the numbers of last year, or even in the year before, had no relevancy to the increased urgency and gravity of this question of un-employment now as compared with last year or two years ago. The complaint they had against the Government was, briefly, that the Government was now faced with the situation which they on those benches had foreseen and fore- told two years ago, of which they had constantly reminded the House on many occasions since, and which had now come before them, and there was no properly co-ordinated machinery, local or imperial, which ought to have been ready to deal with that situation now that it had arisen. It was not a question of more money, for £300,000 was now available for the unemployed, instead of the £200,000 which was voted last year and the year before. It was not so much a question of money as of a proper arrangement which they thought ought to be made, not only that the local authorities might get on with that work which was necessary, but that the Government might set them an example by putting their own house in order. They must therefore press the Government for some security that that rigidity and hardness which had characterised the disbursement of the central fund hitherto should be made an end of, and that in future they would have generous dealing. He did not know whether the disbursement of the money in Scotland came under the control of the President of the Local Government Board, and therefore what he was about to say of Scotland could not be taken as being in any sense a personal attack on him. He knew that in Scotland the money that was given for the relief of distress last winter was altogether inadequate for the necessities of the situation, and was afterwards admitted to be so by everyone concerned. It was not until the members of the distress committee of Glasgow resigned their positions, it was not until the unemployed in Glasgow got out of hand and rushed the public buildings — although he said nothing about that, it was regrettable — it was not until later on that the unemployed men demonstrated in St. George's Square, Glasgow, and they made it manifest that for the future at all events the unemployed at Glasgow were not going to be the dumb, inarticulate masses they had been, but that they had at last found their voice and were going to use it—it was not until these things had taken place that more money was forthcoming for the relief of the unemployed in Glasgow. And even now the money was not characterised by that liberality that they were led to believe last week would characterise the disbursements from the Central Fund, for at the present moment there was friction between the powers that be and the local authority in regard to the payment of men on work connected with the distress committee. It had even been stipulated, and was now a rule, that these poor men, for every hour they were unable to work owing to the weather being bad, though they had travelled fourteen miles to their work, were not to be paid for the time during which they were not actually employed, through no fault of their own. That showed that, although the Local Government Board were driven to take some other more generous action than had characterised the disbursement of the money some six months ago, even now a great deal remained to be done in more generously interpreting the needs of the situation. Having just come up from Glasgow, where he had been in contact with these men, he knew that the engineers and other skilled workmen were out of work in very large, and, he believed, increasing numbers, and although he knew that the outlook was a little better than it was a month or two ago, yet he did not suppose that the numbers of unemployed would be very much lessened this side of Christmas. Therefore, having regard to the increasing urgency of the matter, he joined with the hon. Member who preceded him, as well as others who had spoken from those benches, in asking the Government to give a more satisfactory assurance that liberality, elasticity, and even generosity should attend the disbursements of this fund by a special committee of the Cabinet appointed to deal with the matter. Before sitting down he wished to refer to the observations made by the President of the Local Government Board as to provision against unemployment. In the same speech his hon. friend the Member for Merthyr Tydvil was twitted with having exaggerated the figures of the unemployed. He would in turn, and with equal truth, twit the President of the Local Government Board with not having put the true position with regard to payments to the skilled men's union. As a matter of fact the payments made by members of that society were not 1s. per week, but nearer 2s. per week. For the past twenty years or so they were 1s. 8d. per week. Something had been done by the skilled men as proved by these figures to insure against unemployment. The Minister for War, speaking about a week ago, stated that in his judgment this of itself was one of the main things that could be done to provide against unemployment. The Minister for War was said to be a philosopher, and he generally found that philosophers were the most perplexed people when dealing with ordinary mundane affairs. The right hon. Gentleman did not seem to be aware of all the money being spent now for insuring against unemployment. But as far as the great mass of the people who were now employed were concerned, they could not insure against unemployment because their wages were only barely sufficient to cover the necessities of life when at work, and therefore they had nothing to lay by for the rainy day about which the Secretary of State for War had spoken. He was not satisfied with the position of things, although he admitted the speech of the Prime Minister, so far as the outlook was concerned, was a very considerable improvement upon the speech previously made from the Treasury Bench. They had now apparently got away from the idea which satisfied some a year or two ago that unemployment was merely a question of want of technical training. Everyone, including the Prime Minister now admitted that men who were technically trained were out of work. He and other members of the party to which he belonged wanted some more satisfactory assurance from the Government—and they were going to keep up the debate all night if necessary—that the £300,000 which would be found to be only half enough, was going to be disbursed in relief, and the best way to get that done was by a Committee of the Cabinet who should as often as possible submit reports of its proceedings to the House.

MR. WYNDHAM (Dover): The hon. Member who has just spoken concluded requesting from the Government further, and some more assurance than has so far been given. hon. Members who sit on the Opposition bench. The few brief remarks made by the Prime Minister, the hon. Member for the City of London, did not satisfy them. The hon. Member said that unless their demand was met, hon. Members below the Government benches are prepared to continue this debate until the House is weary or until such further information is made available. I make an appeal from another hon. Member who sits on the Opposition bench. Not one of them has had an opportunity of speaking during the night. One of my certain knowledge, has spoken a number of times without being called. I know whether that is described as an opportunity for debating this matter. I do not wish to introduce this matter into what is an appeal, but the fact that the first speech made on the Opposition benches at all was by my right hon. friend the Member for Dublin, and was not begun until twenty minutes past seven and ended at eight o'clock. Many important speeches have been made in the House, and I appeal on behalf of the hon. Members who sit behind the Opposition bench. I make that appeal to the Prime Minister in his capacity as Prime Minister, in command of a large majority, and also in his capacity of Member of the House. I know that appeal made to him at the beginning of our debate by the Leader of the Opposition, it was then refused. We thought that refusal unreasonable, but we anticipated from that refusal that the promise to be made by the President of the Local Government Board and by himself would be of such a character as to justify him in limiting this debate to a day from his point of view. We have anticipated—I hope with courtesy—to all that has fallen from the President of the Local Government Board and the Prime Minister.

expedient and leaving a full liberty of considering larger questions under more favourable circumstances, the President of the Local Government Board reviewed the policy of every Department of State, and there is not a right hon. Gentleman sitting on the front Opposition bench who in his day was responsible, whether for the Army, the Navy, the Post Office, the Local Government Board, or the Board of Trade, who is not entitled, according to ordinary Parliamentary usage, to get up, it may be for only six or seven minutes, to make some remarks upon the views of the Government as to the best way in which those various Departments can co-operate in this great national endeavour. Suggestions have been thrown out which do not on the face of them commend themselves, so far as I gather, to the judgment of right hon. Gentlemen who have themselves been at the head of these great Departments. Indeed, one of my right hon. friends, the Member for Croydon, felt it incumbent upon him to get up, obviously sincerely, to speak on a subject near his heart, and near, I believe, the heart of the majority of our countrymen. No right hon. Member or hon. Member of this House who has cared, as my right hon. friend has cared, for the British Army, could hear the perfunctory, casual suggestion that this plan might be adopted—a plan never explained to the House on any previous occasion—without feeling bound as a man determined to do his duty in this House, to get up and say what he thought right in the matter. But that is only one case. There must be many right hon. Gentlemen, and certainly many of my hon. friends behind me, who are deeply exercised about many aspects of this problem. But if the Prime Minister believes that an important proposal affecting the Reserves of the British Army can be introduced into the House as an aside by the President of the Local Government Board, and, after a brief but concise speech of some fifteen minutes from a man who has devoted many years of his life to the care of the Army, House. The Prime Minister has, by leave of the House (and we were only too glad to give him that leave), got up once or twice, certainly once—

MR. ASQUITH: Once.

MR. WYNDHAM: He has, I say, got up once, and then he gave an answer in one sentence to the questions which had been put to him. But when the right hon. Gentleman had a larger opportunity of replying, when without asking leave of the House he was able to speak at any length he chose, when, in fact, he was in possession of the House, he did not think it incumbent upon him to reply to a number of very pertinent questions which were put to him by my right hon. friend the Leader of the Opposition. He gave them the go-by. I am not going to speak on the merits of the unemployed question, but I feel that I am justified in pressing the Motion for the adjournment of the debate, because we have had no answer to the two right hon. Gentlemen who have spoken from the front Opposition bench, and because the hon. Gentlemen who sit behind that bench have had no opportunity of addressing the House at all. I believe that the majority of Members of the House will really agree with me that this is so large a question that it cannot properly be compressed into one debate alone. The hon. Member for Rhondda Valley said it was the most important question of debate that had come before the House for twenty years and yet it is going to be decided in one day without a single Member of the Opposition, except right hon. Gentlemen on the front bench, offering a word. My hon. friends behind me have been chafing under the conditions of this debate and I feel bound to express their feelings in this matter. Technically the Motion for the adjournment of the House is called a dilatory Motion, but if the Motion is carried it will cause no delay to the Government. They can proceed with their little dodges in this Department and that Department, and we will wish them God-speed in any of their efforts to meet the great danger and calamity now oppressing the country. But I unhesitatingly say that the House of Commons on this occasion is entitled to resume its ancient liberties. In previous Parliaments it was the right of any Member on any night to move the adjournment of the House if he felt that a grave question of public importance was being dismissed by the Government without sufficient consideration and without giving Members of the House a sufficient opportunity to express their views upon it. That was formerly one of the liberties of the House of Commons, but since this Government came into office it has been largely curtailed, and we meet this autumn under far more stringent conditions of debate than have ever been imposed on the Parliament of any self-governing country. The resolution passed by the Government for the purpose of forcing the Licensing Bill through the House has put it in the power of the Government to prevent any other subject being discussed in the House. This is a dilatory Motion only in a technical sense. It is in reality a Motion to allow the House of Commons the right to speak on a question which has truthfully been said to be the most important subject of debate for twenty years, and that being the case I venture with confidence to press my Motion.

Motion made, and Question proposed: "That the debate be now adjourned."—(Mr. Wyndham.)

MR. ASQUITH: I think the right hon. Gentleman who has just spoken is under the impression that he has been making a persuasive appeal to the Government. I should like to say, after a considerable experience of the House, that a more contentious speech I have never listened to, or one more likely to defeat its own professed object. The House is not discussing anything in the nature of the solution of a great political problem, but is discussing merely temporary expedients for meeting a particular emergency, and the policy of the Government has not been challenged either by the front Opposition bench or by those hon. Gentlemen who sit behind it. In view of these facts, of the time the discussion has already taken, and of the impossibility within a reasonable time of affording another day, I am compelled to rest the Motion.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I rise to say that I do not think the general feeling House really supports the Prime Minister. Undoubtedly Members are all anxious to go to bed. I am aware hon. Members below the gangway that after eleven o'clock is too late hour for the discussion of a subject of interests other parts of the House, in my earlier days it was not thought very late hour. I do not doubt that

Gentlemen below the gangway are anxious to go home, but I would point that it does not affect the interests of a single member of the unemployed whether the debate is concluded now or two weeks hence. There ought to be another day for the discussion of this problem, and if the House adjourns the debate there will be an opportunity to ventilate further various important aspects of the question which have not received adequate consideration. I must enter a strong protest, not for the first time, against the manner in which our discussion has been restricted, and I think the House has been badly used by the Government.

*MR. SUMMERBELL (Sunderland) said he wished to enter his protest against the proposed adjournment. He had attended very all-night sitting since he had been in the House, and he had been in the House for thirty hours to consider questions of much smaller importance than the subject of the present debate. If it suited the Opposition to keep the House there for about thirty hours on a question of smaller importance, this question, which was one of the most important they could discuss, ought to be discussed as long as possible. He had noticed that about eight o'clock that night there were only four hon. Members on the Opposition Benches, yet it was the Opposition leaders who said that those Gentlemen that sat behind them had been very anxious to take part in the debate, and were still anxious to do so. If they were really anxious there was plenty of time to debate the question. There was no time-limit, and they could have until a quarter to three that afternoon. To argue, therefore, that there was no time was to beg the question. There was no more important question for the House to discuss than the unemployed problem. In the town which he had the honour to represent they had had more severe unemployment than in any other town. There they saw people going sixteen miles day after day to gather coals. He had seen them going, and he had seen them coming back, and he wanted to appeal to the House that morning to try and put itself into the position of the unemployed, who were turning out morning after morning—

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member is not entitled to discuss the general subject on the Motion for the adjournment.

*MR. SUMMERBELL said that the House, in his opinion, could not debate a more important question, and he hoped they would reject the Motion for the adjournment by an overwhelming majority, in order that they might discuss the question and get that unanimity which all the Members of the House proclaimed they desired. They were interested in the question, and they desired to see it solved.

EARL WINTERTON (Sussex, Horsham) said that the hon. Gentleman who had just spoken had laboured under some misapprehension, which had led him to take up an inconsistent attitude. He had read some of the speeches made by the hon. Gentleman and some of his friends immediately after the last general election, and he had understood that one of the things they most objected to in the House of Commons was its habit of discussing important matters in the early hours of the morning. Yet the hon. Gentleman was now supporting the Government in their determination to force the House to discuss in the small hours of the morning what by their own admission was one of the most important questions the House had discussed for twenty years. The hon. Member had referred quite irrelevantly to some former occasion on which he said that the House had been kept up on a much less important matter. He was sure that the hon. Member would remember, or if he did not remember himself, some of his friends would do so, that on every all-night sitting they on the Opposition side of the House had endeavoured to get the debate adjourned, in order that it might take place at a more reasonable time. He had risen to support his right hon. friend who had moved the adjournment of this debate. Despite the laughter which had come from below the gangway when his right hon. friend had suggested that some of them were as interested in the unemployed question as those in other parts of the House, such was, of course, the case, and he would remind hon. Gentlemen who had laughed that it was not those who talked the loudest who did the most. It was possible to take an interest in the unemployed question and to feel very strongly on that question as they did, without constantly referring to the fact that they were direct representatives of democracy. He appealed to the Prime Minister to assent to the Motion which had been made by his right hon. friend. The hon. Member for Yarmouth and others on that side of the House had from the beginning of the debate been anxious to take part in it, and it was not fair that they should be asked to discuss the question at that time of the morning, and that those of them who desired to support the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydvil in the lobby should be compelled to do so at so late an hour. The Prime Minister, if he insisted on the course which he had laid down, would not gain but would rather lose support in the country and among his own followers. The people of this country knew perfectly well that if the Government intended to deal with this question in a proper manner they would not endeavour to force it through the House in the early hours of the morning.

*MR. JOWETT (Bradford, W.) said that in reply to the noble Lord he might say that both he and his colleagues on those benches were still opposed to discussing important questions at a late hour such as that when it could be avoided, but so far as he could gather they were unfortunately so situated that they could not really help it. They had had no promise from the Prime Minister that another day would be given if the debate were adjourned. He wished to ask the Prime Minister if he would give them another day. Unless he would do so he did not think they could be expected to allow the discussion to be adjourned. Some of them were very concerned to have the question of unemployment discussed fully and voted on. He found it very difficult to keep within the Rules of the House on the Motion for the adjournment. They were not all old hands like some hon. Members above the gangway. He would like to give the reason why in his opinion the debate should be closed if the Government would not give them another day. A week or two ago he was waited on by the parents of a youth who were very greatly concerned about their son, who had enlisted in the Special Reserve in accordance with the Government's scheme for enlisting the unemployed. He was aged seventeen years and a few months, and if the debate were adjourned more cases of that kind would be heard of. It was a most unfortunate thing. The parents of this youth were decent, hard-working people, who did not feel that their child was a suitable child to be taken into the Special Reserve.

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member is not seriously bringing forward that as an argument against the adjournment.

*MR. JOWETT said he was serious to the extent that he honestly held that things would be allowed if the adjournment took place as the Prime Minister wished it to be—

AN HON. MEMBER: No, no.

*MR. JOWETT said if they were not allowed to deal with such cases as he had described it would of course affect the question of the adjournment. He hoped the Prime Minister in answer to the very earnest appeals which had been made would give another day for so important a subject. The matter had not been properly discussed, and all manner of important issues had been raised by the Conservative Party and by the Labour Party as well as by Liberal Members below the gangway, any one of which would take a whole sitting to debate properly. Under the circumstances he thought the Prime Minister could not deny them another day.

Earl Winterton.

the House really supports the Prime Minister. Undoubtedly Members are all very anxious to go to bed. I am aware that hon. Members below the gangway think that after eleven o'clock is too late an hour for the discussion of a subject that interests other parts of the House, but in my earlier days it was not thought a very late hour. I do not doubt that hon. Gentlemen below the gangway are anxious to go home, but I would point out that it does not affect the interests of a single member of the unemployed whether the debate is concluded now or three weeks hence. There ought to be another day for the discussion of this problem, and if the House adjourns the debate there will be an opportunity to ventilate further various important aspects of the question which have not received adequate consideration. I must enter a strong protest, not for the first time, against the manner in which our discussion has been restricted, and I think the House has been badly used by the Government.

*MR. SUMMERBELL (Sunderland) said he wished to enter his protest against the proposed adjournment. He had attended every all-night sitting since he had been in the House, and he had been in the House for thirty hours to consider questions of much smaller importance than the subject of the present debate. If it suited the Opposition to keep the House there for about thirty hours on a question of smaller importance, this question, which was one of the most important they could discuss, ought to be discussed as long as possible. He had noticed that about eight o'clock that night there were only four hon. Members on the Opposition Benches, yet it was the Opposition leaders who said that those Gentlemen that sat behind them had been very anxious to take part in the debate, and were still anxious to do so. If they were really anxious there was plenty of time to debate the question. There was no time-limit, and they could have until a quarter to three that afternoon. To argue, therefore, that there was no time was to beg the question. There was no more important question for the House to discuss than the unemployed problem. In the town which he had the honour to represent they had had more severe unemployment than in any other town. There they saw people going sixteen miles day after day to gather coals. He had seen them going, and he had seen them coming back, and he wanted to appeal to the House that morning to try and put itself into the position of the unemployed, who were turning out morning after morning—

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member is not entitled to discuss the general subject on the Motion for the adjournment.

*MR. SUMMERBELL said that the House, in his opinion, could not debate a more important question, and he hoped they would reject the Motion for the adjournment by an overwhelming majority, in order that they might discuss the question and get that unanimity which all the Members of the House proclaimed they desired. They were interested in the question, and they desired to see it solved.
